ROSEMARY BREAD WITH DRIED CHERRIES

From Jean Brady. Although you may warm it before serving, it dries out easily, so be careful. To save your sanity serve at room temperature. These proportions are for 1 loaf, which will serve 10 people. For 20 people, either double the recipe or make in 2 separate batches.

4 1/3 cups all-purpose unbleached flour and more to shape
1 1/2 tsp. kosher salt
2 tbsp. granulated sugar
1/4 cup fresh rosemary, chopped
2 tsp. instant yeast
1 3/4 cups warm water
1/2 cup good quality olive oil
1/2 cup dried cherries

Mix together 4 cups flour with salt, sugar, rosemary and yeast. Add olive oil and water to make a sticky dough. Knead by hand or in a mixer with a dough hook for 3-4 minutes – the last 2 minutes add cherries and last 1/3-cup flour. Cover with plastic wrap; allow to double in size, about 1 to 1-1/2 hours. Shape into large round or oval loaves; place on parchment-lined sheet, attractive side up. Preheat oven to 425. Allow dough to double once again, for about 45 minutes. Slash top of loaf with razor sharp knife or razor blade in 3-inch "X". Place in oven. Bake 45 minutes and allow to cool on rack for at least an hour. Makes 1 loaf.

SALAD OF BABY GREENS WITH GRILLED SALMON, PECANS, BLACKBERRIES AND BLACKBERRY VINAIGRETTE

From Jean Brady. One large platter heaped with salad at each table is gorgeous; but you can also make up individual plates. Serve dressing on the side. Make sure the pecans are very fresh.

Note: This recipe originally called for skinless, boneless grilled chicken breasts, perfect for when it's used with a non-dairy meal.

Blackberry vinegar
1 quart best quality white wine vinegar
25 fresh blackberries
Blackberry vinaigrette

All ingredients for vinaigrette should be at room temperature.
1 tbsp. best quality Dijon mustard, spicy or mild
3 tbsp. orange or tangerine juice
1/2 cup blackberry vinegar
salt and freshly ground white pepper to taste
1 clove garlic, peeled and crushed
3 shallots, peeled and finely minced
1/2 teaspoon sugar
1-1 1/2 cups olive oil, according to taste
Salad:
freshly ground salt and pepper to taste
30 cups mixed baby greens
2 bunches fresh tarragon, rinsed and stemmed
20 grilled salmon fillets
8 mangoes or papaya, peeled and diced
5 large, ripe avocados, peeled and sliced
2 cups raw or roasted unsalted pecan halves
1 1/2 pounds small seedless grapes
3 cups fresh blackberries
60 baby asparagus spears, blanched and sliced into 2-inch pieces

For Blackberry Vinegar:

Pour vinegar and blackberries into a glass or stoneware jar and leave in a dark place for 8 days. Gently remove blackberries and strain vinegar into decorative glass jar for storing and serving.

For Blackberry Vinaigrette:

Whisk together all ingredients except oil. Gently whisk oil into mixture. It tastes best if made 1 day in advance and left at room temperature.

Salad:

Salt and pepper lettuce leaves; add tarragon. Toss with vinaigrette. Place heaping amount of greens on platters – one for each table – or on individual plates. Top with salmon, mangos, avocados, asparagus, pecans, grapes and blackberries. Place vinaigrette dressing in bowls with ladles on each table so guests can help themselves. Serves 20.

POT DE CRÈME AU CAFE

From Jean Brady. Baking this luscious dessert in antique porcelain cups or cups to match the theme of the luncheon adds to the decor. You can surprise the bride by baking hers in a cup from her china. Remember the cups don't have to match. Often it's more interesting to see a variety of patterns on the table. Be careful not to under- or overcook it.

7 1/2 cups cream
1/4 cup ground espresso beans
3/4 to 1 cup granulated sugar, to taste
18 egg yolks
20 chocolate-covered espresso beans

Preheat oven to 300. Heat sugar, cream and espresso beans over low heat until sugar dissolves. Beat into yolks. Strain through fine strainer or cheesecloth. Divide into 20 individual china cups, pots de crème cups or ramekins (custard moulds). Set containers into a bain-marie (large pan of boiling water) in bottom third of oven. The hot water should come halfway up outside of cups. Bake 25 to 40 minutes, until just set. To determine doneness insert a sharp, thin-bladed knife or toothpick one inch from outside of container. If it comes out clean, remove from water and cool. Chill in refrigerator. Take out 1/2 hour before serving.

MERINGUE MUSHROOMS

From Connie Burdick. These mushrooms are right out of Alice in Wonderland and look gorgeous piled into baskets and tucked beneath maiden hair fern. To make your own "superfine" sugar, place regular granulated sugar in food processor and pulse until it achieves a fine texture.

6 egg whites
1/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. cream of tartar
1 1/2 cups superfine sugar
1/4 tsp. almond extract
3/4 tsp. vanilla extract
unsweetened cocoa to dust
6 oz. bittersweet chocolate, melted

Using an electric mixer on medium to high speed, beat egg whites in large bowl until foamy. Beat in salt and cream of tartar. Change speed to low, gradually add sugar, almond and vanilla extracts. Raise speed to high, beat until stiff, about 5 minutes.

Preheat oven to 225. Place meringue mixture in large pastry bag fitted with a plain 1/2-inch diameter tip. Line 2 cookie sheets with parchment paper. Make mushroom stems first while meringue is firmest. Press out meringue while lifting bag until stems are about 1/2 to 3/4 inches tall. Press out caps in rounds, about 1 inch in diameter. Try to keep them high and puffy rather than flat. If caps have points on them, dampen a finger and press points flat. Sprinkle stems and caps with cocoa.

From flirting to marriage

Stacey Naglie
Special to the CJN

We are Stacey Naglie and Sean Moxley, the bride and groom to be. We're getting married at Toronto's Adath Israel Synagogue in October 2011, and I'd like to share our story.

We first met via a mutual friend I had agreed to go out with so that she could introduce me to Sean. The attraction was mutual. After a few weeks of flirting back and forth, Sean finally asked me out. The rest is history!

After seven years as a couple, we went to Las Vegas for a holiday. A few days before leaving, Sean came home from work, got down on one knee and proposed! I accepted and immediately went to my parents' house to share the good news.

We soon started sharing our feelings about having children and whether we would raise them with a religion.

While I was adopted into a Jewish family and was converted as an infant, Sean was a content atheist with no particular urge to change. However, Sean's belief was that children should be raised with traditions and faith to help them deal with the big questions in life. So we decided that we would raise Jewish children in a Jewish home and that Sean would convert.

We met with my rabbi, who directed us to the Judaism conversion course led by Rabbi Martin Berman. The course introduced Sean to a concept of God and religion that he had never experienced before, and somehow it all felt right to him.

He wasn't the only one who was touched – I had tears streaming down my face.

For the next three months, we went to class and studied. This past Dec. 6, we wrote our first of three exams, and we passed with flying colours! Sean got an 88 per cent. Needless to say, I was crying yet again. We still have so much more to learn.

But we can say without a doubt that nothing will stop us from being the best Jews we can be.

We have been very busy over the past few months with work, conversion studies and wedding preparations, and we're sure the upcoming months will be even more hectic. We're grateful to have families that have been able to help us out this year, as we couldn't have done it without them! We have accomplished a lot, but the best is yet to come.

Couple marries amid G20 protest

Sara Sherkey Fox
Special to The CJN

Thousands of police dressed in riot gear, weeks of heightened security, and protesters lining the streets of Toronto. Not exactly a romantic setting but such was the atmosphere outside of our June 24, 2010, wedding on King Street, the day before the official start of the G20. In spite of all of this, 220 guests happily gathered to celebrate our wedding day at the venerable King Edward Hotel.

When Matthew and I became engaged in January 2009, we had planned for a September wedding. However, circumstances dictated otherwise and when June 24 became available for us to get married, I became very excited. To me this was bashert as my grandparents were the first couple married in Bergen-Belsen on June 24, 1945, after the camp was liberated. This was a great opportunity to honour their memory and their loving marriage.

Destiny is a word that I would use to describe many aspects of mine and Matthew's relationship, including how we met. What started off as a cloudy July 1 holiday at the cottage in 2007 turned out to be the day I would meet the man I would one day marry. After only exchanging looks for a few short minutes, we both felt we wanted to see each other again. As it happened, my cousins were friends with my husband and subsequently our phone numbers were exchanged. After only a few months of dating, we both knew that we had something special.

Now being happily married for almost eight months, we continue to look forward to the future milestones we will share together. On every June 24, we will not only celebrate our anniversary but also that of my grandparents, a wonderful anniversary gift indeed!

Bridal designers embrace the ballerina

Anita Szabadi-Gottesman
Special to The CJN

"Everything is beautiful at the ballet" is a line of one of the lead characters speaks in the delightful Broadway spectacular, A Chorus Line. The story traces the journey of a group of ballet and modern dancers vying for a place on the Broadway stage.

Many little girls dream about making it as a ballerina and being on stage performing such wondrous works as Swan Lake or Giselle. Hollywood has just launched its newest psycho-thriller Black Swan, set on and off the ballet stage.

Bridal designers – Vera Wang, Monique Lhuillier, Carolina Herrera, Peter Langer, to name just a few, with relative newcomers New York-based Randi Rahm and Barcelona's Rosa Clara also presenting several ballerina designs – have embraced the ballerina in every little girl by including ballet-inspired wedding gowns in their 2011 collections and featuring them in their runway shows.

Some of the show-stopping gowns are replete with layers of tulle, chiffon, organza, silk and satin, and several designers have created dramatic effects by adding feathers and other accents. Frilly, feminine and romantic, a ballerina-inspired gown allows the bride to create a true fairy-tale feeling for her wedding day.

The ballet-inspired gown has a simple silhouette that's created with a tight bodice till the waist and a full skirt bottom. A corset top can also be paired with a flowy skirt. Many skirts have built-in crinolines or layers of chiffon or tulle. Detailing includes lace and crystals. The overall look is pure romance in easy-to-wear simple styling.

While ballet-inspired gowns can be floor length, designers have chosen to include a selection of gowns that are true ballerina length. These gowns fall halfway between the knee and the ankle, making them extremely comfortable and easy to wear. Dancing through the reception with a ballerina-length gown ensures freedom of movement and no trampling on the front or back of the gown during the festivities.

Style diva Martha Stewart has also joined in creating a complete ballet-inspired look for this year's bride. She offers ballet-pink bridesmaid's dresses and pink-based decor. From pink flowers and cupcakes decorated with pink icing to the bride's bouquet, Stewart has embraced the ballerina look as a little girl's dream come true – perfect for her wedding day.

The bride can choose to carry this romantic ballerina look to her hairstyle by wearing a high bun and accessorizing with a ribbon or jewelled headband. Flower girls can add to the charm in tutu-inspired dresses in white or pink with matching ballet slippers.

The bride may also prefer ballet slippers or ballet-style flats for her walk down the aisle or to change into for the reception. Comfortable and versatile, ballet slippers complete the look for the ballet-inspired bride. Ballet slippers and ballet flats are available in satin and leather in dozens of styles. Choose styles with bows, crystals or pearls, or classic-style toe shoes with ribbon accents that tie at the ankles. Add a touch of glamour by choosing sequined ballet slippers. Most ballet slippers can be dyed to match the colour of a wedding gown. You can customize a pair of ballet slippers with unique embellishments and the help of a glue gun.

But there are many ways to achieve this. Grabelle Herrmann suggested that if a mikvah isn't available, the women can gather at a spa and enjoy shampoos, facials or other forms of cleansing. Hot tubs or swimming pools can also be used. Friends of the bride are there as support, to share marriage stories and to help their sister and friend go through this transition.

"I believe holy moments can happen any time. Holiness can happen in our living room, our bedroom or our courtyard. If women feel comfortable at a spa, you can bring spirituality to where people already are. There are many ways to connect."

Since the wedding shower honors the cycles of life – the universal concept of no beginning and no end – the menu, as well as the floral decorations and gift suggestions, will all be round, signifying the birth of a new union and that a husband and a wife are two parts of one soul. It is delightfully surprising how this perfect, beautiful shape appears so frequently in nature – from the seed, which is the beginning of life, to many of the most beautiful flowers, fruits and vegetables.

For gifts, since guests will be in a mikvah, spa or around running water, round soaps, sponges, candles, doilies, placemats, crystals and rocks or CDs with beautiful music can be presented. Round gifts of food and sweets such as chocolate truffles, cookies and cakes, round biscuits, crackers, muffins and breads, round cheeses and cheese balls, round fresh and dried fruits are also options.

Beautiful floral decorations start with roses, peonies, dahlias, daisies, camellias, chrysanthemums, gardenias – the list is endless. Depending on the season, bulbs of lovely flowers make great gifts.

For the menu, serve round, symbolic foods – roasted whole fish will be presented head to tail, as in sign of the Pisces zodiac, a symbol of a long life. Fish is a token of wisdom, fortune and fertility. Whole baked fish stands for righteousness. The garnish of ruby red pomegranate seeds and pomegranate syrup is a wish for a sweet marriage filled with fertility.

Leeks are included for luck and opulence, soup made from squash, which promises fullness in blessing. The fish are complemented by round baby potatoes and beets and a fennel bulb. There's a round cheese ball encrusted with round hazelnuts, as well as angel eggs stuffed with truffles and caviar. The M'hancha pastry, which is formed out of filo dough and coiled like a snake, is a symbol of spiritual power and the awakened self. It also represents sexual energy.

Student-led group unites Jews, Muslims in charity work

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

A student-run initiative that unites Jewish and Muslim students based on their shared religious value of charity has spread its programming to the University of Toronto.

The Tzedaka-Sadaqah Project (TSP), founded in 2009 by four Jewish and Muslim students at the University of Western Ontario, held its first event in Toronto earlier this month.

Despite of the Feb. 2 snowstorm that hit the Toronto area, 15 students made their way to U of T's Hart House to make 80 lunches for the Scott Mission, a drop-in centre for Toronto's homeless.

The lunches, which were sponsored by U of T's Multi-faith Centre for Spiritual Study and Practice, contained sandwiches, fruit, drinks and a dessert.

During the program, a Muslim and Jewish student each gave a presentation on the roots of social action and interfaith work in their respective traditions, and there was also a projector showing slides that displayed inspirational quotes by Jewish and Muslim leaders, and statistics on Toronto's poverty rates.

Avi Shack, 24, who sits on the TSP board and helped organize the U of T event, said the purpose of such programs is to help Jews and Muslims find common ground.

"We see humanitarian work as a portal to develop an encounter between the two groups who otherwise wouldn't have a reason to meet on campus. Through these encounters, they can develop a sense of trust, and through that trust, they can have more substantial conversations about the issues that keep the two communities apart," said Shack, a part-time student at U of T.

Shack said he was working toward his master's in sociology at McMaster University when he first met, and was inspired by, one of the group's founders, Ben Rosen.

Rosen, now a 23-year-old medical student at McMaster, co-founded TSP during his last year of undergraduate studies at UWO. He said it wasn't until he and his friends organized a group of Jewish and Muslim students to serve hot meals to London's homeless through a local church's Out of the Cold program that he realized how much the two faiths had in common.

"We started talking about some of the values that we have in common, and we came up with the idea that it's important to develop a relationship in spite of the fact that we may disagree on political issues," Rosen said.

Since Jewish and Muslim UWO students first began volunteering at the Dundas Street Centre United Church in London for the Out of the Cold program two years ago, TSP has expanded its reach to organize events at McMaster and U of T, and it plans to launch at the University of Ottawa next month.

Jewish and Muslim students gathered earlier this month at the University of Toronto to make lunches for Toronto's homeless as part of a new student-led initiative called the Tzedaka-Sadaqah Project.

Azim Kasmani, who sits on the TSP board, also saw the value in building bridges between the two communities.

Kasmani, a 24-year-old epidemiology student at the University of Ottawa who first connected with TSP when he was a McMaster student, said working with TSP has opened his eyes to the commonalities between Judaism and Islam.

"We went to a couple of Shabbat dinners for Muslim and Jewish students at Ben's house, and that was a really great opportunity to see how similar we are in some of our values. Just getting to know people on a personal level, we have a lot more of the same goals and ideals than you'd think," Kasmani said.

He added that one of the values that both faiths place high importance on is family. "Ben's family hosted the dinner, and the way they hosted it and the hospitality – it was a very family-first type thing," he said.

He said an organization such as TSP is important because it can effect change on a local level.

"We're always thinking about international causes, but I think this is a real opportunity to give back to our local Canadian communities, and on top of that, reduce the tensions between the Muslim and Jewish communities."

Shack said that since the U of T event was such a success, he hopes that Ryerson University and York University will also hold TSP programs by the end of the year.

"I've connected with a number of students on the executive at Hillel and also at the Muslim Students' Association," he said, adding that Hillel has expressed interest in partnering on future programs that "centre around Jewish and Muslim students coming together to do social justice work together and also to learn a bit more about each others' faiths and hopefully engage in a more substantial dialogue."

Shack said the U of T event garnered interest from about 75 students who said they want to support TSP and be informed about future programs.

Rosen thinks the success of the organization lies in the fact that it doesn't try to do too much too soon.

"The philosophy of the organization is that we don't start with the most difficult issues. We observed that... the only time Jewish and Muslim students encountered each other was at some heated political rally, and they were mostly negative encounters," Rosen said.

"So we figured that if we're going to focus on the things that divide us, we have to pay equal mind to the things that unite us."

Que. MNA blocks debate on boycott motion

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A motion condemning the boycott of a Montreal shoe store selling Israeli shoes was blocked by the single Québec solidaire (QS) member of the National Assembly.

Amir Khadir, MNA for Mercier, prevented the motion from being debated after it was presented Feb. 9 by the Action démocratique du Québec's François Bonnardel (Shefford) and supported by Parti québécois MNA Martin Lemay (Ste. Marie-St. Jacques) and Liberal Lawrence Bergman (D'Arcy McGee).

Boutique Le Marcheur on St. Denis Street is located in Lemay's riding.

All three politicians have visited the store to lend their support to owner Yves Archambault.

The motion "deplores the boycott campaign" in front of the store, which began in October, and states that "the National Assembly reiterates its support for the understanding on co-operation between the government of Quebec and the government of the State of Israel, which was signed in Jerusalem in 1997 and renewed in 2007."

Khadir participated in the Dec. 11 picketing outside Le Marcheur, and his party passed a motion in November 2009 endorsing the international boycott campaign against Israel. Soon after, Khadir tried to have the legislature entertain his motion in support of the boycott.

Supporters of Le Marcheur have been rallying outside the store to counter the anti-Israel boycott campaign.

In a statement, the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC) welcomed the motion and its implied repudiation of Khadir and his party's involvement.

Executive director Luciano Del Negro explained that Khadir was the only member to refuse to give his consent to the Speaker for the motion to proceed. Unanimous consent of all members present is required for a motion to be debated.

"What we had was a full house, 124 MNAs from all three major parties, and the independents, saying yes, and one member being isolated."

Del Negro noted that what happened is significant because it's the first time any government in Canada, and possibly the world, has clearly rejected the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign.

"People always say the situation is more difficult in Quebec, but it is the National Assembly that has set a new benchmark on the issue that we hope will inspire other legislatures. There is now a consensus among the political class in Quebec that BDS is not acceptable. You don't have that elsewhere in Canada."

QIC research and communications director David Ouellette added: "This unprecedented disavowal of the BDS campaign by the legislature confirms QIC's long-held contention that the boycott campaign of Israel enjoys no significant support in Quebec."

Khadir and party co-leader Françoise David have stated that he regretted taking part in the demonstration, because his intention was not to encourage a boycott of the store, but only of the Israeli-made merchandise, which represents a small part of its wares.

Khadir's press attaché Christian Dubois said the MNA refused to debate the motion because it went beyond denouncing the boycott of Le Marcheur. The QS has called for the suspension of the Quebec-Israel agreement.

Khadir, first elected in 2008, ran unsuccessfully for the Bloc québécois in the 2000 federal election.

The group that has been organizing the demonstrations announced on its website last week that it would be resuming its action this past Saturday.

Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) had suspended the protests the previous two Saturdays, Jan. 29 and Feb. 5 based on fears that the little-known Mouvement Nationaliste-Révolutionnaire Québécois, which it judged to be extreme right-wing and racist, was planning to show up. It did not.

In a departure from the past, PAJU identified the location of the demonstration as the corner of St. Denis and Duluth streets, rather than naming the nearby store.

Applebaum said that all of them have been "in the womb of a woman who had just been liberated. The trauma of that kind of birth affects everyone."

None of the three had a lot of information on their history, said Lasky. "Our parents gave us moments, but not a chain of events. My parents could not speak of the horrors. They had life to live and didn't want to live in the past."

Applebaum said they would also like to learn about the local Jewish community's role in helping to bring European Jews to North America. "This project is not just about being born there. It's about survival."

Their goal, said Lasky, is to put together a project that will fill in a gap in history for their grandchildren. "We don't want them to be detached from their roots." Everyone invited for an interview, said Volgyesi, accepted without reservation. "They take from 45 minutes to an hour, and each one is an incredible experience."

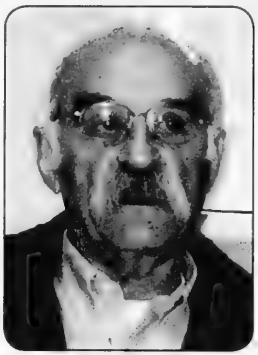
Staking out David's Jerusalem

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

For the layman, it's hard not to think of the Bible when considering archeology in the Holy Land.

It turns out, it's just as hard for many archeologists. A dispute has been raging for years over mixing the scientific means of gathering information versus relying on the holy book as a guide. National Geographic magazine recently highlighted the argument, which has focused to a large extent on the biblical figure of David and his capital city, Jerusalem.



Dan Bahat

Were David and his son Solomon majestic figures lording it over a grand kingdom, or were they minor warlords in control of a dirt-poor corner of the Middle East. Or did they exist at all?

The disagreement among Israeli archeologists focuses on one Israel Finkelstein, a Tel Aviv University professor who dismisses suggestions that David and Solomon were anything like the glorious, city-building monarchs described in the Bible, versus Eilat Mazar, who is excavating a site in Jerusalem that she claims is David's ancient palace.

Enter Dan Bahat to shed light on the dispute. Bahat is a colourful figure in Israeli archeology who served as chief archeologist of the Jerusalem Region for the Israel Antiquities Authority. This reporter first met Bahat in 2009 when he conducted a fascinating tour of the Western Wall tunnel that runs for 1,600 feet from the visible wall into the Arab Quarter of Jerusalem.

"I am in the school of Mazar," said Bahat, who recently ended a visiting teaching position at the University of Toronto's St. Michael's College. "You can't prove anything from a lack of information."

Bahat has left Toronto for now, although he promises to return next autumn to resume teaching at U of T.

"My field is Jerusalem," he said. "When Israel Finkelstein and others wrote, 'How can it be a big empire if we didn't find anything?', my point of view is that Jerusalem cannot be judged. Why? Because it was destroyed so many times, we should be grateful for the smallest morsel of information."

The ancient City of David, which lies south of the current Old City walls and is the site of a largely Arab neighbourhood, was first excavated in the 1880s. Archeologists found nothing of the Davidic period and "the result was that people say there was no David or Solomon in Jerusalem," he explained.

"The problem in Jerusalem is that the upper part of the hill was completely shaven by the Romans. The Romans took the stones to build Aelia Capitolina, the name [Rome] gave for Jerusalem after it exiled the Jews following the Bar Kochba revolt.

"So all that can be looked for are the slopes on both sides."

"Mazar was clever. She found areas that were never excavated and she tried and found 10th- and 11th-century BCE remains," Bahat said.

But, he continued, "she made a grave mistake. She immediately said this is David's palace" and that prompted an "attack" from Finkelstein.

"She should have said, 'I found structures built in the 11th century and used in the 10th century BCE and this is exactly what the Bible said, that David made his residence in the citadel of Zion and he called it the City of David. I think this is exactly what she found.

"You should never, when you come to digs, come with previous knowledge. It will distort what you find… You can refer later to the Bible," he said.

Bahat believes that the argument of naysayers, who question David's prominence, was put to rest by the discovery in 1993 of an inscription in Tel Dan, in which "another king called Israel the House of David. That meant David left a great impression on the Aramean king."

There are historians and archeologists who "falsify history" and who reject evidence of the Davidic influence. One "wrote a book that accuses Jewish archeologists and historians of trying to erase Arab history in the country. That's part of a world view that embraces the Palestinian narrative and denies the Jewish one."

Other discoveries have bolstered the biblical description of the Davidic kingdom, he continued. Another find, this time southeast of the Dead Sea in Jordan, dated to the time of David and Solomon, suggest the scale of the mining operation could only have been organized by a well-to-do kingdom, National Geographic reported.

Asked about recent Palestinian claims that denied a Jewish connection to the Western Wall, Bahat quickly responded, "These are lies."

In fact, he said, recent excavations in the Western Wall tunnel are going deeper than before and finding artifacts from the First Temple Period – the era associated with Solomon, almost 1,000 BCE.

"It shows the city existed north of the Second Temple area and into [today's] Old City."

Bahat, 72, said Israeli archeology authorities won't permit him to dig anymore – they worry he'll die before he publishes his findings. But, "if I could dig on the eastern side of Jerusalem at the eastern wall of the Temple Mount, it is believed to date back to the Solomonic period. But you'd have to dig in an Arab cemetery," and that is not in the cards, he said.

Teachers concerned about merger plans

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Teachers at the two Jewish school systems slated to merge have doubts about the feasibility of the project, says union spokesperson Jeff Itcush.

Itcush, who has taught at Bialik High School since 1994, said there is concern about a lack of consultation with educators.

"Schools are more than buildings, Smart Boards and computers," said Itcush, a past president and first vice-president of the Federation of Teachers of Jewish Schools. "Most teachers fear a complete absence of consultation in the educational direction of this proposal. There should be maximum consultation of all stakeholders."

Teachers were officially informed Jan. 31 of the proposal to merge Jewish People's and Peretz Schools/Bialik High School and United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah High School. Prior to that, there had been no request for input from the teachers on the idea, although it was being formulated by volunteer school leaders since last year, Itcush said.

Itcush does agree with school leaders that the current organization of the Jewish day school system is no longer "tenable." The two systems in question cannot continue to operate separately, because of the competition for students and resources. But his preference is a middle course that would entail "some kind of marriage" at the administrative level, while allowing each system to maintain its distinct philosophies and strengths.

A lot of money would be saved and efficiency gained if the two schools shared some of the same professional administrators, had a centralized board and co-operated in other ways, such as in finances and government relations.

"There's too much duplication now," he said.

Itcush also foresees a logistical headache resulting from the creation of a "community" school that tries to accommodate a range of Jewish and secular studies options.

"Even as things stand now, it is an enormous challenge to schedule in a way that includes all of the government-mandated curriculum and the Jewish studies, and have all students in the right place at the right time," he said. "In a multi-track system, with different streams and options added, the task seems insurmountable."

FTJS president Mordechai Antal, who has taught at Bialik for eight years, thinks that how well the consolidation of UTT/Herzliah on the Snowdon campus is accomplished will be a test run for a larger merger. The St. Laurent campus is to be closed and moved to Snowdon by this summer.

"We will see how well they manage the merger of students and staff, how they deal with the parents. That's just at the beginning now," Antal said.

Itcush said the worst-case scenario envisioned is that the merger process will cause instability that will lead to parents pulling their children out of schools and younger teachers choosing to establish their careers elsewhere.

Some teachers are optimistic that the merger as now proposed would be "the best-case scenario," he continued, and there is excitement about new facilities and new structures. But for that to unfold, there is agreement that good management is crucial.

Is the Brotherhood hiding or sharpening its fangs?

As coverage of the Egyptian crisis entered its second week, several analysts argued that the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood is a voice of moderation and that there's nothing to fear from it.

On cbc.ca (Feb. 4), Kent State University professor Joshua Stacher maintained that while it uses an "Islamic idiom" to define its policies, the Brotherhood isn't driven by a radical religious ideology. Stacher claimed that, in practice, it's nothing but a benign, pragmatic organization intent on promoting non-violent social and political change within Egypt. "It's just a boring, sleeping group that just does politics really well," he said.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In a Feb. 3 op-ed in the New York Times, Scott Atram, an academic and author of a book on the Brotherhood, downplayed its significance within Egyptian society. Atram depicts the Brotherhood as a disorganized, ineffective group which, although it seeks power, has failed for 83 years to turn Egypt into an Islamic state, and is now "marginal to the spirit of revolt now spreading through the Arab world."

Continuing with the theme of a benign Brotherhood, the Globe and Mail's Doug Saunders ("Who's afraid of the Muslim Brotherhood?", Feb. 5), boldly predicted that "There's zero chance of Egypt's uprising turning into the 1979 Iranian revolution or the terrorist violence of Hamas; there are no parties, and no Egyptian constituency of any size, seeking a theocracy."

He quoted George Washington University political scientist Nathan Brown: "'First, the Muslim Brotherhood is against a theocratic state or any role for clerics... And second, they prefer to work within a pluralist system... The idea of creating an Islamic state does not seem to be anywhere near their agenda.'"

These claims of moderation contrast starkly with statements from senior officials of the movement itself, affirming the gradual creation of an Islamic state governed by sharia law. As was mentioned in last week's column, the recent Pew Center survey of attitudes in Muslim countries about the role of Islam in politics found that nearly 60 per cent of Egyptians favour fundamentalist Islam over modernization. This hardly makes Egypt immune to the lure of the Brotherhood.

"Would the Muslim Brotherhood participate in a government that recognizes Israel and works with western governments?" Saunders asked. His answer: "Their leaders, and informed observers, say yes."

Only certain spokesmen, but not the movement's leaders, have issued statements that appear to accept the 1979 Egypt-Israel peace treaty. However – and this is crucial – they do not state this unambiguously. There's always a qualification added that gives them an out and amounts to double-speak meant to hoodwink unsuspecting westerners.

Thus spokesperson Mahoud Ezzat stated (CBS News, Feb. 1): "We will respect the peace treaty with Israel as long as Israel shows real progress on improving the lot of the Palestinians" (emphasis added). Brotherhood member and former spokesperson Kamal El Helbawy told the BBC (Feb. 3): "We will adhere [to the peace treaty], but it should be reviewed to bring justice in [since] we can't accept [Israeli] occupation." More subtle is the same message from Brotherhood member Sobi Saleh (Wall Street Journal, Feb. 2), who said that his movement would abide by the treaty "so long as Israel doesn't breach the treaty first." (Since part of the treaty concerns autonomy for the West Bank leading to a permanent settlement "within five years," the Brotherhood can readily charge that Israel has breached the treaty, rendering it null and void.)

When the BBC host pointed out that officially the Brotherhood insists on shredding the peace treaty, he bluntly asked El Helbawy: "Are you aware of the widespread suspicion – sometimes not with all gullible western journalists – but the widespread suspicion among a lot of people in the West, that the Muslim Brotherhood puts up people like you to sound and look moderate and to cover the fact that you're a highly extremist Islamicist organization?"

It's not hard to imagine El Helbawy's response. But as to the actual leaders of the Brotherhood, on Japan's NHTV, Rahad al-Bayumi, the group's second-in-command said straightforwardly that any government that replaces the Mubarak regime should cancel the peace agreement with Israel.

סקר של מכון הסקרים האמריקאי "פיצ'ר" מעלה כי במקרה וירושלים תחולק בין ישראל לפלסטין כחלק מהסכם שלום עתידי- רובם של ערביי ירושלים היו מוכנים לעבור לשטח ישראל כדי להיות זכאים לאזרחות ישראלית, מאשר להיות תחת ריבונות המדינה הפלסטינאית. 35 אחוזים העדיפו את ישראל, 30 אחוזים את פלשתין, והיתר לא יכלו להחליט. הסיבות הבולטות להחלטה זו היו הטבות כלכליות, חופש תנועה, בעוד שמעדיפי פלשתין נקבו במניעים לאומיים ופטריוטים.
ההדלפות האחרונות מויקיליקס הדגימו עד כמה היו מוכנים הפלשתינאים לוותר במסגרת משא ומתן עם ממשלת אולמארט, מה שמוכיח שטענתם של נתניהו וליברמן ש "אין עם מי לדבר" איננה נכונה.
גם הסקר הנ"ל מוכיח את אותה נקודה.

Meatballs always a hit

Eileen Goltz
Special to The CJN

I had a culinary 911 call a few weeks ago. A neighbour was having a bunch for her husband's new work colleagues, and she was panicking because she doesn't cook. This was the first time she was going to be entertaining as the "boss' wife" and she felt like she should go the extra mile.

As her budget was tight I suggested she prepare a veggie platter and make some meat balls. Everyone likes meatballs, I tell her, and they can be made with a less caloric meat like ground chicken or turkey.

Personally, I tend to make basic meat balls and leave the gourmet ones to others. I gave her several recipes to choose from.

MAMA MARIE'S BAKED MEATBALLS

A neighbour who is an excellent cook assures me they have been gracing her table for over 25 years to rave reviews. Who am I to disagree with her 13 grandkids?

1 tbsp. olive oil.
1/2 cup minced onion
2 tsp. dried oregano
1 tbsp. minced garlic
1 1/2 lb. ground beef.
1/2 cup cracker crumbs
2 eggs
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. ground black pepper.

Preheat oven to 375. In a skillet, over high heat, saute the onion in the oil for 5 minutes or until soft. Add the garlic and cook for 1 more minute. Place the onion and garlic into a bowl and add the beef, oregano, cracker crumbs, eggs, salt and black pepper. Mix to combine. Roll into golf ball sized balls and arrange them on a baking sheet with sides. Bake for about 20 to 25 minutes or until the meatballs are browned and cooked throughout. Serve as an appetizer or add them into your favorite tomato sauce over pasta. Serves 8

BAYOU MEAT BALLS

1 1/2 lb. of ground meat (your choice of beef or ground chicken or turkey).
1 cup of breadcrumbs
1 egg
1/4 cup of water or soy milk
1 tsp. of salt
1/4 tsp. garlic powder
ground black pepper to taste.
1/2 cup oil
1/2 cup of chopped red bell pepper.
1 onion, diced

1 tsp. minced garlic
1/2 cup of green onion tops and bottoms.
hot sauce to taste
flour
5 cups of water

In a large bowl, combine the meat, breadcrumbs, egg, 1/4 cup water, salt, garlic powder and black pepper. Form the mixture into small balls then roll them in the flour. Heat the oil in a large pot and then brown the meatballs on all sides. Remove meatballs from oil and saute the peppers, garlic and onions just until they are soft. Return the meatballs back to the pot, add the water and a dash or two or hot sauce. Cook, uncovered for about 35 to 45 minutes, until the gravy thickens and the meat balls are cooked throughout. Serve with tooth picks or over rice. Serves 6 to 8 as appetizers, 4 as main course

PACIFIC RIM MEATBALLS

16 oz. of pineapple chunks in juice, drained, save the juice
1/2 to 2/3 cup of red or green bell pepper, chopped fine.
1 tsp. fresh ginger chopped or 1/4 tsp. dried
1 1/2 lb. ground turkey
1/2 cup of green onion slices.
2/3 cup of toasted breadcrumbs
1/2 tsp. of salt
1 cup ready-made teriyaki sauce

Preheat oven to 400. In a large bowl, combine 1/4 cup of the pineapple juice, chopped bell pepper, ginger, ground turkey, sliced green onion, breadcrumbs and salt and mix to combine. Shape the mixture into balls and place them in a 9X13 baking dish. Pour the teriyaki sauce over meatballs; mix lightly to coat the meatballs Bake, uncovered for 30 minutes. Serves 6 to 8.

SAVOURY MEATBALLS

1 lb. ground beef
1 egg, beaten
1cup bread crumbs
2 tsp. minced garlic
1/2 cup minced onion
1 to 2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
1 to 2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
1/4 tsp. fennel seed, toasted and chopped fine
1/4 tsp. dried red pepper flakes
1/4 tsp. dried oregano
1/2 + tsp. kosher salt
1/4+ tsp. fresh ground pepper
marinara sauce of your choice

Preheat oven to 350. Mix all ingredients together in a large bowl. Roll mixture into balls. It should make between 12 to 15, depending on the size. Spray cooking sheet with olive oil spray and bake meatballs for 10 minutes. Turn them over and bake for another 10 minutes. Remove them to a large pot and add marinara sauce. Cook on low heat for about 30 minutes. Serves 6 to 8

Egypt pledges to honour peace treaties

Canada, Israel, U.S. welcome commitment

JTA

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu welcomed statements last weekend by Egypt's military that it would honour the country's peace treaty with Israel.

"The longstanding peace treaty between Israel and Egypt has greatly contributed to both countries and is the cornerstone for peace and stability in the entire Middle East," Netanyahu said Saturday night in his first comments since Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak resigned on Feb. 11, ceding power to the military.

Netanyahu expanded on the statement Sunday in cabinet.

"The peace agreement with Israel has stood for many years. During this period, all Egyptian governments have upheld and advanced it, and we believe that it is the cornerstone of peace and stability, not only between the two countries, but in the entire Middle East as well," he said.

Meanwhile, Reuters reported that Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak spoke by phone with Mohamed Hussein Tantawi, the head of Egypt's Higher Military Council, in the first contact between Israel and Egypt's new military rulers.

In an announcement broadcast on state television last Saturday, an Egyptian army spokesperson pledged that Egypt would honour all its international and regional treaties.

The news prompted immediate reaction from the international community. U.S. President Barack Obama welcomed the proclamation, according to a White House statement.

In his own statement last Friday, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canada "respects" Mubarak's decision to step down and called on Egyptians to now work toward "free and fair elections."

"We want to see the rule of law and stability. We want to see respect for human rights, including the rights of minorities, including religious minorities. We want to see the transition to a democratic Egypt," Harper said.

He added that Canada would continue to support Egypt in implementing "meaningful democratic and economic reforms" as well as Egypt's efforts to promote regional stability and peace "including with Israel."

Harper and Obama held lengthy discussions about the situation in Egypt when the two leaders met in Washington on Feb. 4, according to a spokesperson from the PMO.

In conversations with various world leaders over the weekend, Obama "reaffirmed the United States' strong commitment to supporting a more peaceful and prosperous Middle East in close consultation with all our regional partners," according to the White House.

Obama's comments came after Netanyahu made his statements over the weekend.

Israel has been deeply concerned that Egypt's turmoil could threaten the 1979 peace accord signed between the two countries.

The United States, Egypt's top ally, is also eager to ensure the accord remains in place. The Egyptian military strongly supports the accord, in no small part because it guarantees U.S. aid for the armed forces, currently running at $1.3 billion a year.

Also last Friday, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and the Canada-Israel Committee released a joint statement saying they were "encouraged" by recent developments in Egypt.

"We remain cautiously hopeful that these developments mark the first steps toward genuine democratic freedom in Egypt. This will require a stable transition, supported by key civil institutions, in order to safeguard Egypt from extremist influences."

Meanwhile, an Egyptian opposition leader has declared his country's peace treaty with Israel over.

Ayman Nour, who plans to be a candidate for president of Egypt and who heads the secular-liberal Tomorrow party, reportedly told Egyptian Radio Sunday that "The Camp David accord is over," and said that Egypt should renegotiate the accord's terms.

His remarks followed the statement from the military on the weekend that it would honour the 20-year treaty.

Nour, 46, was jailed in 2005 after challenging Mubarak in presidential elections. Released from prison in 2009, he was a leader of protests in recent weeks, which toppled the government and Mubarak's 30-year-reign.

Demonstrations in Cairo and Bahrain

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

CAIRO — Thousands of Egyptians flooded back into Tahrir Square on Monday, only hours after military police and soldiers had cleared the last few dozen pro-democracy activists from the area.

The army had appeared to be in full control of the central Cairo square after they issued an ultimatum to demonstrators to evacuate or face arrest. Tahrir Square has been at the heart of the protests that began on Jan. 25 and within weeks toppled President Hosni Mubarak.

But hundreds of police in uniform and plainclothes marched through the square to show solidarity with the demonstrators shortly after the military announced that the area had been evacuated.

The police protesters and the crowds of onlookers around them disrupted traffic that had begun flowing at the weekend.

Waving Egyptian flags, the police demonstrators shouted "We and the people are one," witnesses said. Policemen said they wanted to "honour the martyrs of the revolution."

Lt. Mohammed Mestekawy told Reuters, "We are with the people. We ask the people of Egypt not to ostracize us. We are not enemies."

The army ordered the remaining protesters, who were cordoned off by troops and military police in front of a stage erected during the anti-Mubarak demonstrations, to leave or face arrest.

The widely loathed police were withdrawn from the streets on Jan. 28 after failing to crush protesters with batons, tear gas, rubber bullets and live fire.

The army stood by during those confrontations, without helping the protesters or the police.

In related developments, small-scale clashes erupted in Bahrain as security forces tightened their grip on Shiite communities for Monday's "Day of Rage" protests inspired by upheaval in Egypt and Tunisia that led to the ouster of both countries' leaders.

Helicopters circled over the capital Manama, where protesters were expected to gather in the afternoon, and police cars stepped up their presence in Shiite villages, breaking up one protest with tear gas and rubber bullets.

At least 14 people were injured in clashes overnight and on Monday.

Bahrain, where a Sunni family rules over a Shiite majority, has offered cash payouts in the run-up to the protest to prevent Shiite discontent from bubbling over as popular revolts spread in the Arab world.

"We call on all Bahraini people – men, women, boys and girls – to share in our rallies in a peaceful and civilized way to guarantee a stable and promising future for ourselves and our children," Bahraini activists said in a statement issued on Twitter.

"We would like to stress that Feb. 14 is only the beginning. The road may be long and the rallies may continue for days and weeks, but if a people one day chooses life, then destiny will respond."

Diplomats say Bahrain's demonstrations, organized on the social media websites Facebook and Twitter, will be a gauge of whether a larger base of Shiites can be drawn on to the streets. The big test will be if demonstrations take hold in Manama, where demonstrations are rare.

Protests in the Gulf Arab island state could embolden other marginalized Shiites in nearby Saudi Arabia, political analysts say.

There was no immediate comment from Bahraini authorities.

Bahrain is a small oil-producing country whose Shiite population has long complained of discrimination by the ruling Sunni al-Khalifa family, well before popular uprisings in Tunisia and Egypt emboldened activists throughout the region.

King Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, trying to defuse the tension, said he would give 1,000 dinars ($2,650 US) to each local family, and the government has indicated that it may free minors arrested under a security crackdown last year.

Non-OPEC (Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries) Bahrain, which unlike its Gulf Arab peers has little spare cash to use for social problems, said last week it would spend an extra $417 million (US) on social items, including food subsidies, reversing its attempts to prepare the public for cuts in subsidies.

Other Arab countries have jumped on the demonstrations bandwagon, with protests in Yemen intensifying in the wake of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's ouster. Hundreds of anti-government demonstrators clashed with supporters of Yemen's president on Monday south of the capital, Sanaa, with both sides hurling rocks as protests escalated in the impoverished Arabian Peninsula state.

Benny Gantz takes over as Israel's new chief of military staff

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz took over as Israel Defence Forces' 20th chief of staff on Monday, declaring that he was prepared to take upon himself the "important mission" of leading Israel's army through the challenges and developments facing the region.

The day of transition began with a ceremony at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem, where Gantz was promoted from his previous rank of major-general. He officially assumed his new role in a military ceremony a few hours later at the Kirya defence compound in Tel Aviv, taking over from outgoing chief of staff Gabi Ashkenazi.

In his acceptance speech, Gantz thanked Maj.-Gen. Yoav Galant, who had been the initial choice for the position, for his years of service in the army. Galant was disqualified as a result of allegations against him regarding the seizure of public land near his home.

Then, addressing Ashkenazi, under whom he had served as deputy chief of general staff, Gantz said, "You rehabilitated the IDF at a difficult time. You are handing me a determined, disciplined, professional and primed army. I swear to you that I will continue in your path."

"Maj.-Gen. Benny Gantz is an outstanding officer and an experienced commander," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told cabinet on Sunday. "His experience is vast in terms of both operation and organization. He is endowed with all of the qualities needed to be a wonderful commander for the Israel Defence Forces."

The 51-year-old veteran army man was chosen after months of controversy and debate surrounding the initial selection and subsequent disqualification of Galant for the position.

Gantz first enlisted in the IDF as a paratrooper in 1977 and graduated from officer school in 1979. He has since served in many major command capacities over the course of his 30-year military career.

After completing officers' school, Gantz returned to the Paratroopers Brigade, where he served as a platoon, company and battalion commander. He assumed command of the Israel Air Force's elite Shaldag unit in 1989, where he served for three years before assuming the command of the Paratroopers Reserves Brigade.

In 1994, he was appointed to command the Judea Brigade in the Judea and Samaria Division, and a year later, he was promoted to commander of the Paratroopers Brigade.

Gantz took a leave of absence in 1997 to obtain a master's degree in national resources management from the National Defense University in the United States. Upon returning to active service in the IDF, he became commander of a reserve division in the Northern Command.

Gantz served as commander of the IDF's liaison unit in Lebanon during Israel's withdrawal in 1999 and was personally responsible for shutting the gate between the two countries.

In 2000, he was appointed commander of the Judea and Samaria division, overseeing IDF forces in the West Bank during the outbreak of the second intifadah. Two years later, he was appointed general commanding officer of the Northern Command, one of the highest positions in the IDF.

In 2005, he became commander of the IDF ground forces, a position he held during the Second Lebanon War. The position did not place him in a decision-making capacity, and Gantz later remarked that he unsuccessfully advocated mobilization of reserves and a ground campaign at an early stage.

Gantz was next appointed as the IDF's military attache in the United States. Upon his return to Israel in 2009, he assumed the role of deputy chief of staff. He held that position until his recent retirement from the IDF, after being initially passed over for chief of staff.

Unrest in Egypt reverberates at security conference

Dina Kraft
JTA

HERZLIYA, Israel — In the sleek, blue auditorium filled with spotlights and large video screens at Israel's premier annual national security policy conference, all eyes were fixed on the revolution next door, in Cairo's Tahrir Square.

From the Israelis among the experts, diplomats and security officials assembled for the 11th annual Herzliya Conference near Tel Aviv, there were dark assessments and discussion of preparing for worst-case scenarios.

"Like all Israelis, we'd like to see democracy in Egypt," Shlomo Avineri, a leading political scientist at Hebrew University and a former director of Israel's Foreign Ministry, said in a speech last Wednesday. "However, that's probably not going to happen."

Comparing events in Egypt to the days when the Soviet Union collapsed and the world was awash with hopes for political freedom, Avineri noted that "we got Putin instead, a neo-absolutist system.

"Something similar might transpire in Egypt because you need a civil society, a belief in tolerance and individualism. Those elements were lacking in Russia and they are lacking in Egypt," he said. "We should be realistic even with all our support for the people of Egypt and democracy."

The Herzliya Conference has become the annual setting for assessing the current focus and outlook of Israel's political and security elite. As Israel watches and waits to see how things in Cairo will shake out, the conference served as an opportunity to speculate about the future and mourn the possible passing of an era of stability along Israel's southern border with Egypt.

Yakov Amidror

The changes in Egypt and the possible ripple effect they pose for the rest of the Arab world prompted many to argue for Israel to redouble its efforts on securing a peace deal with the Palestinians.

"Our region is moving very fast to the next war, and the only way to stabilize events in Tunisia and Egypt is to find stability by having an interim peace agreement," said Shaul Mofaz, a former defence minister and chief of staff who is now part of the opposition. "We need to rebuild trust between both sides."

Israeli President Shimon Peres made a similar plea in his opening remarks at the conference.

"The recent dramatic events raise the need to rid the Israeli-Palestinian conflict from the agenda," he said. "The conflict is being used by all sides for the worse. The peace process is crucial for our neighbours, not just for us."

Yet in an indication of the deteriorating relations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, none of the Palestinians who were invited to the conference agreed to come. PA President Mahmoud Abbas was among the speakers last year.

Israel's prime minister usually speaks at the conference, along with other top Israeli officials and diplomats and security experts from around the world. But this year, neither the prime minister nor any senior cabinet ministers delivered speeches – perhaps a reflection of the radio silence Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at first demanded after news of the budding revolution in Egypt broke last month.

The conference at times felt like something of an unofficial shivah for President Hosni Mubarak's Egypt – not a warm and fuzzy ally, but most important for the Israeli security community, a reliably stable one.

The lingering standoff in Egypt at the time, between anti-government protesters and Mubarak, was a source of added concern for the Israelis. Security experts said that the longer the uncertainty lasted, the more likely it would be followed by radicalism.

"The longer President Mubarak stays, the more it endangers an orderly transition and the more Vice-President Omar Suleiman and the army are tainted by the street, and the more this goes on, the more Egypt is in free fall," said Salman Shaikh, director of the Brookings Doha Center in Qatar.

Shaikh was joined by Egyptian and Jordanian colleagues during a session on the Arab street and its effects on regional stability.

There was also much discussion of the long list of brewing regional concerns – the looming threat of a nuclear Iran, Hezbollah's growing political influence in Lebanon, Islamicization in Turkey – not to mention the possible impact of the events on Egypt on peacemaking with the Palestinians.

"Who will come to power and push the Palestinians towards concessions with Israel?" asked Yakov Amidror, a retired Israeli general who held senior roles in military intelligence. "Things have changed for the worse, not the better."

Amidror said that weapons smuggling into Gaza had increased since the start of the unrest in Egypt, and Hamas in the long run would be strengthened by a new regime in Cairo.

Most analysts who spoke at the conference agreed that the prospect of the Muslim Brotherhood – Egypt's version of Hamas – seizing control in Egypt was slim. But the consensus was that whatever government comes to power next in Cairo would be less amenable to Israeli and American interests than the current one.

In a marked departure from the tone of anxiety and concern coming from most of Israeli officialdom, Peres portrayed a less threatening picture of the revolt in Egypt, calling it a spontaneous uprising by youth "wearing T-shirts and jeans."

The protests, he said, were "not organized by an army, a religion or political parties," but by young Egyptians using the Internet.

"You can lock the doors, but the Internet opens the windows," said Peres, who called the unrest a "social rebellion rather than a political one."

NATO Secretary Gen. Anders Fogh Rasmussen sounded a more ominous note. Speaking at the conference, he said the persistence of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict contributes to the overall sense of instability in the Middle East and urged the sides to take action.

"We do not have all the time in the world," Rasmussen said. "There is a new dynamic in the region. We must seize the opportunity to build on it."

Inquiry condemns IDF

A Turkish government inquiry into Israel's raid on a Gaza-bound flotilla that killed eight Turks and a Turkish-American says Israeli soldiers shot five victims at close range. The Feb. 11 report says two of the victims were killed even before soldiers boarded the Turkish ship in May. The report says Israel blatantly violated international laws. Israeli commandos raided the flotilla last May as it sought to break the blockade on the Hamas-ruled strip. A report published last month after an internal investigation in Israel found the Israeli soldiers who took part in the raid acted in self-defence. It also determined that Israel's 3-1/2-year blockade of Gaza does not violate international law. Turkey criticized the report, with Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan saying that it had "no value or credibility." The Turkish Foreign Ministry issued a statement saying it was "appalled and dismayed" at the report. The United States defended it, saying the Turkel Commission, which investigated the incident in Israel, conducted an "impartial and transparent investigation."

Salonika mayor visits

Salonika Mayor Yannis Boutaris visited Israel to learn how to bring more Israeli tourists to Greece's second-largest city. The mayor participated in the 17th International Mediterranean Tourism Market in Tel Aviv. He was accompanied by his vice-mayor for economic management, Hasdai Capon, the first Jewish person to be elected to office in a major Greek city since before World War II, and the president of the Hotel Association of Salonika. Boutari met with Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai, Greek Orthodox Patriarch Theofillo in Jerusalem and with the board of a Greek Jewish Holocaust survivors' group. He also visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum. Prior to his visit to Israel, Boutaris met with representatives of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, who had been invited to Greece by Prime Minister George Papandreou. Papandreou promised the visiting Jewish American leaders that he would help Israel forge closer ties with the European Union.

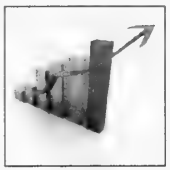
Israel considering alternatives to Egyptian natural gas

Avi Bar-Eli
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The interruption to Egyptian gas exports forced the Israel Electric Corporation (IEC) to spend an additional $1.5 million (US) a day on alternative fuels, according to Shaul Zemach, director general of the National Infrastructure Ministry.

The Egyptians halted gas exports after the pipeline to Jordan and Syria was bombed recently, apparently the action of saboteurs. The entire system had to be shut so it could cool down, industry sources said. Gas exports were expected to resume within a week, however.



The IEC is using alternative fossil fuels, such as diesel and heavy, low-quality fuel oil. They cost 10 times more than natural gas.

About 40 per cent of the country's electricity production is from natural gas, and about half of the gas comes from Egypt, via exporter EMG.

"The first, most important thing that needs to enter the public discourse is energy security. This is something that is starting to concern many countries around the world, and it should concern us, too," Zemach told the Herzliya Conference, an annual event in which participants discuss international strategic issues.

Zemach said Israel needed to ensure its own needs were met before gas could be sold abroad.

"We won't let natural gas be exported until we're sure we've taken everything into account to make sure Israel has energy security. In times of crisis, everyone falls back on his own assets, and is first to use them. We'll export gas but first we'll make sure we have enough for times of crisis. We must shelter Israel from external crises," he said.

Israel's dependence on oil is a fiscal problem, too, he said.

"The gas reserves discovered off Israel's shores are a strategic asset. As time passes, we'll rely on them more, and thus any export policy will put Israel's long-term interests first," Zemach said.

Meanwhile, government officials were pressing the private sector to speed development of a natural gas deposit they say can make Israel energy independent.

Infrastructure Minister Uzi Landau called for government-backed loans so financing can be obtained to develop the Tamar field, off Israel's coast in the Mediterranean Sea, a spokesperson said. Landau also favours exempting the field's developers from a proposed windfall tax.

"We have to do everything to improve Israel's energy security," Landau told Israel Radio. "It is Israel's obligation to remove every obstacle to developing Tamar as soon as possible."

Landau's spokesperson, Chen Ben-Lulu, said the goal was to have gas from Tamar flowing into Israel by 2013.

"The explosion in Egypt... just proves the need to do so," Ben-Lulu said. "We want energy independence as soon as possible."

The explosion in Egypt's northern Sinai Peninsula came amid a popular uprising against longtime Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Under a deal that went into effect three years ago, Egypt is to sell Israel 1.7 billion cubic metres a year for at least 15 years. Israeli industry analysts believe that flow would help diversify Israel's fuel sources while cementing political relations.

At the same time, the turmoil in Egypt, which supplies up to half of the natural gas that Israel currently uses to power its electrical plants, has emphasized to Israelis the dangers of relying on other sources for fuel.

Israel's Tamar field is said to contain about eight trillion cubic metres of gas. In December, gas exploration companies led by U.S.-based Noble Energy announced that another deposit in Israeli waters, Leviathan, contained some 16 trillion cubic metres.

The finds are enough to keep Israel energy self-sufficient for decades, Israeli experts say.

"Israel needs to achieve security of energy supply. This is one of the most fundamental security and economic aspects of a country," said Gina Cohen, an electricity and gas industry consultant based in Israel.

The supply of gas from Egypt has always been dogged by fears that the flow could be disrupted by saboteurs or political forces hostile to the deal and Egypt's 1979 peace treaty with Israel.

Pipe dream or reality: Star of David on moon?

GUY GRIMLAND
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If Yariv Bash, Kfir Damari and Yonatan Winetraub succeed and send a robot to the moon, they'll donate their millions in prize money to promote science among Israel youth. The trio recently announced their participation in the Google Lunar X Prize competition – an effort to send an unmanned vehicle to the moon and beam back high-quality photos and short films.

The competition seeks to encourage space scientists and engineers from around the world to develop cheap technologies for robotic space exploration. To win, a team needs to raise private funding. The first team to achieve the mission gets $13 million (all funds US); second prize is $5 million. The other prizes total $5 million. So far 13 groups have registered for the competition. Prizes can be won up to the end of 2015.

So far, the three Israelis have raised only around $50,000 in donations out of an $8 million target.

The X Prize gained publicity in 2004 when Burt Rutan, who led a group in co-operation with Microsoft co-founder Paul Allen, built and flew the first private manned spaceship.

The Israeli group's official declaration was issued at a space conference held by Tel Aviv University's Yuval Ne'eman workshop for science and technology. The group goes by the name SpaceIL and is registered in Israel as a non-profit organization. It's the only Israeli team in the competition.

The three young men are not motivated by money. They view the competition as a national mission to develop Israel's ability to explore space.

"Our mission is to put the Israeli flag on the moon. During the next two years, we intend to build a small space robot that will make the long journey from the earth to the moon. The vision is to promote technological education in Israel," the group's website states.

"America's space program excited the imagination of an entire generation in the United States. We hope that this project will inspire children of the next generation in Israel... The Israeli startup nation was born as a result of civilian adaptation of military computer technology. Similarly, advancing a civil space program will boost space technology" in Israel, the site goes on to say.

"No, we're not imagining things," the site adds. "This is an initiative of a few engineers – experts in hardware, software and space technology who are considered capable, prudent people in their daily lives."

So what exactly is the project's technological concept? "The world of small satellites has changed significantly over the past decade. Today a box the size of a Coca-Cola bottle can be sent to space at a low cost of $1 million," Bash, 30, said. "We intend to use relatively cheap components and pack our entire spacecraft into one box... That box will be put on a commercial launcher that will put the vessel into orbit around the earth. From there, we need to head toward the moon and carry out a landing.

"The main problem, of course, is how to get there," Bash goes on to say. "This same little box is really a flying gas tank with some electronics and cameras. Most of the space in our vessel is taken up by fuel needed to reach and land on the moon.

"Unlike large satellites, we plan to build a vessel that will last only two weeks to a month in space. That helps us for two reasons – there won't be a need for massive protection against the sun's rays, and there won't be a need for large battery power to drive the vessel when there is no sun... Everything will be built from existing, cheap products," Bash says.

"We're not the first to try this. Orbiting the earth right now are dozens of such small CubeSat satellites that contain simple, cheap materials. Of course, this is our early planning, and we assume that much will change as we get to more advanced planning stages. We have a number of space experts who are working on various issues, starting with the ignition system, and including topics such as navigation, landing and flight monitoring," Bash says in conclusion.

Winetraub, 24, says that at this stage, the group is addressing planning issues that are not likely to be resolved until the end of the year – technical surveys and the like. "These are surveys in which you present your concept of a technological solution and then check to see what unresolved questions remain," he says. "At this point, we've reached decisions about the size of the satellite and how to pack the components into the vessel."

Bash, Damari and Winetraub have different technological backgrounds. Bash is an electrical and computer engineer. He's studying for a master's degree in business administration at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

Damari is a communications systems engineer and a lecturer in communications and computers. He's also a consultant in communications and information security. He served as a technology officer in an elite unit at military intelligence.

Winetraub is a graduate of the space technology program at NASA's International Space University. He works as a systems engineer for Israel Aerospace Industries. He is also enrolled in a master's program at Tel Aviv University's interdisciplinary program for outstanding students.

Damari predicts the group will get the job done. "I think we'll reach the moon, but we have some challenges to meet. I believe that the technological solution we chose, the nanosatellite, will reach the moon."

Will they make it? Will they realize their ambition? Winetraub says yes.

Cancer survivor writes book about experiences

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

It was an ordinary day in August 2005 when Ruth Rakoff's life changed forever.

After dropping off her three sons at different friends' homes, she went for what she expected to be a routine mammogram. When the results showed that Rakoff had breast cancer, her busy world of being a mom and an active member of her tight-knit community shrank to one that revolved entirely around her disease.

While in recovery, Rakoff used writing to make something of her experience, and in the fall of 2010, her memoir, When My World Was Very Small, was published.

"I didn't set out to write a book," Rakoff said. "I had no intention of publishing anything, but it just kind of happened."

Rakoff recalled long days spent on her couch, too tired from her treatments to leave her living room. "I wanted to show people that I was doing something, so I began to write."

She wrote everything by hand and eventually worked up the courage to share her work with her husband. "He typed out my words for me and encouraged me to join a writing group. At first I would only share small samples of my work, but eventually people wanted to see the whole piece."

Her brother persuaded her to look for a publisher.

"I got lucky. This was the first thing I've ever written – people hate hearing that!" Rakoff said. "The whole experience has been surreal. The first time I saw my writing in book form, I freaked out. I was fascinated that anyone would be interested in such a personal memoir, but it's a universal story about community, support and surviving a crisis."

Rakoff described the 18 months it took to write and publish When My World Was Very Small as therapeutic, although she doesn't see the book as a how-to guide to surviving cancer. "If my book offers a reflective image, it would only be to say I know how you feel," she said. "Everyone finds their own path and deals with cancer in their own personal way."

For her, one of the hardest parts of being sick was having no interest in eating. She devotes an entire chapter of her book to describing food memories from different times in her life. "For me, food is a reference point," said Rakoff. "I use it as a mnemonic device to remember where I was and what I did. Because I barely ate for an entire year, I feel like I lost that chunk of time and that I have no memories. When I wanted to start cooking again, it was a huge milestone. I knew I was getting better."

Ruth Rakoff

Rakoff said her family life is now back to normal, though everyone was changed by her illness. "My sons are people they may not have been had I not gotten sick. At a very young age, they learned to understand the value of community, empathy and compassion. They learned to be a good friend."

Rakoff is now working on a novel. "I'm having fun writing about something other than myself. I want to move on from my story. I have no intentions of being that person who can't move beyond a tragedy."

Sam Borenstein's paintings exhibited in New York

Compiled by CJN Staff

The paintings of the late Montreal Jewish artist Sam Borenstein (1908-1969) are being exhibited for the first time in the United States, in the heart of New York City.

Yeshiva University Museum's (YUM) Selz Gallery at 15 West 16th St. is showing 35 of Borenstein's works until May 8.

It's a slightly abridged version of the retrospective Sam Borenstein and the Colours of Montreal, which was first exhibited at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts in 2005, and then toured the University of Toronto's Hart House and Mount Allison University's Owens Gallery in Sackville, N.B.

The American exposure is a dream come true for Borenstein's twin daughters, Erin and Joyce Borenstein, the latter of whom made the 1991 Oscar-nominated, Genie Award-winning animated film Colours of My Father: A Portrait of Sam Borenstein.

Born in Lithuania, Borenstein immigrated to Montreal in 1921. He was a clothing factory worker who liked to write poetry. Then he turned to visual art and, although virtually self-taught, he became a master of a style called Canadian Expressionism.

Over a 40-year career, he mainly painted scenes of Montreal and the Laurentians in vibrant hues and with exuberant brushwork, as well as still lifes and portraits.

"Through his paintings, he captures the movement of the wind, the heat of summer, and the many colours of snow," said Concordia University art history professor Loren Lerner, who curated the MMFA show.

"He captures the personality behind the face, and the fragrance of flowers. He is able to make the invisible visible."

Borenstein loved to paint outdoors and was inspired by nature, but his landscapes are bustling with people as well, even if sometimes they are just abstract squiggles of paint.

The Borenstein sisters will be present for the exhibition's vernissage Feb. 27 from 2 to 4 p.m., and Joyce's film will be screened.

Most of the paintings are the family's possessions, and some are on loan from private collections.

Sam Borenstein and the Colours of Montreal* is on exhibit at Yeshiva University Museum until May.

The MMFA and now the New York show are part of their tireless efforts to make their father's work better known, a mission they have carried on from their late mother, Judith Aron, who died in 2003.

They found a sympathetic audience at YUM, whose director, former Montrealer Jacob Wisse, likes Borenstein's art.

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

ANITA

We dare you to not be moved by this lovely and quiet, award-winning film. Anita begins on the morning of July 18, 1994, a day like any other. Things change suddenly when the nearby Argentine Israelite Mutual Association is bombed, sending Anita Feldman's life into a tailspin. Her mother has gone to collect a cheque for government support of Anita, who suffers from Down Syndrome. Not understanding what has happened, Anita goes in search of her mother, and is swept up with people who are disoriented like herself. This multi-cultural portrait of Buenos Aires reveals individuals full of love and desperation. As Anita, Alejandra Manzo delivers a stunning performance in one of the best films to come out of Argentina in many years. The film also stars Norma Aleandro, who is considered the "Meryl Streep" of Argentina.

A modern-day Passover story

David Silverberg
Special to The CJN

A touring theatre production that tells the true story of an Ethiopian Jewish family travelling from Africa to Jerusalem arrives at Toronto's Jane Mallett Theatre in the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts next week.

One of a Kind stars Yossi Vassa and his real-life journey of trekking 700 kilometres on foot with his family from northern Ethiopia to Sudan and then flying to Israel.

The story may be familiar to those who recall the Ethiopian Jewish exodus in 1984 and 1991. It's a fascinating chapter in the book of Israeli history known as the Law of Return, which states that Jews anywhere in the world can come to Israel and become full citizens.

Canadians can relate to this story, says Howard Rypp, founder of Tel Aviv-based Nephesh Theatre, responsible for One of a Kind. "Canada is an immigrant country, and this show is all about that dream of having a homeland and the sacrifices done to get that dream."

One of a Kind focuses on Yossi and his family, as well as giving us a glimpse into life as a Jew in Ethiopia. Rypp says audiences will see how antisemitism played a role in Yossi's early life. The emotional heft in the show will be profound for both adults and children, Rypp notes, adding how song and dance will add a necessary contrast to the heavier themes.

The play begins with Yossi as a 10-year-old boy. When he grows up to be a teenager, he realizes the community rabbi's son has fallen in love with his sister. The family, including a headstrong grandmother, remain central to One of a Kind's journey.

Seven Ethiopian actors play all the roles, Rypp notes, and have dedicated themselves to this production for six years. One of a Kind has enjoyed a cross-continental tour as well as a two-week stint on Broadway. In Israel, it's been presented in Hebrew more than 500 times.

The show isn't all weighty intensity. Rypp says humour is a key part of One of a Kind. "The first half is especially carefree, and audiences will find lots of humour in Yossi's family life in Ethiopia," he adds.

What does the show intend to impart to the audience long after the final curtain? "An understanding of how special these people are," Rypp quickly replies. "We should admire what these Jewish people went through." He pauses. "And it's a modern-day Passover story, too, right?"

One of a Kind runs for two shows on Feb. 24. Matinée and evening shows. Jane Mallett Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre For The Arts, 27 Front St. E. Box office information available at 416-366-7723.

It's all in the fingers for Ukrainian-born prodigy

Jordana Divon
Special to The CJN

While many seek to learn their destiny through the lines on their palms, violinist Vadim Gluzman can say his fate was sealed by his fingers.

It's a lofty statement, but in this case quite fitting. Back in the 1970s in the Soviet Union, children selected for the region's specialized music education program were asked to present their hands for inspection at the end of a rigorous audition process.

Gluzman, then six years old, took a very practical approach to the request.

"I was sure they were checking my fingernails to see if they were clean," he says with characteristic deadpan humour. "But they were just looking at the structure of my hands to see what instrument I was best suited to play."

The verdict? Violin. A choice that initially horrified the young musician.

"My father had the misfortune of telling me that piano was the king of the instruments, and violin was the queen. Of course I wanted to play the king. So for the next few months my parents had it pretty tough."

Once the storm cleared and he settled into his instrument, the Ukrainian-born prodigy quickly developed into one of the standout talents in a school that has produced the violinists Maxim Vengerov and Vadim Repin.

He continued to hone his craft in Israel, after the Gluzman family made aliyah in 1990. A stint at Julliard under the legendary Dorothy DeLay soon followed.

In the years since his professional debut, critics have praised Gluzman's immense depth and technicality, while singling out his ability to channel an otherworldly connection to 19th- and 20th-century sentiment.

The 37-year-old virtuoso brought that energy to Roy Thomson Hall for his debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 16, and he performs with the orchestra again on Feb. 19. Gluzman will play Johannes Brahms' Violin Concerto as part of a celebration of Czech and Estonian composers led by the dynamic Jewish-Estonian conductor Eri Klas.

The challenge of engaging with one of the greatest concertos ever written does not escape the versatile musician.

"I'm in awe in front of it," he admits. "I remember panicking on stage during the first concert and I caught myself thinking, 'I am playing Brahms? I am allowed to play Brahms?' There is this feeling of humility being in front of it."

Perhaps that sense of humility has been a winning salve: his New York debut of the program garnered rave reviews, with the New York Times music critic Allan Kozinn pronouncing that Gluzman is "destined for, if not already at, the pinnacle of violin playing."

When asked how he copes with reviews of that calibre, Gluzman thinks for a moment before responding.

"A review is an opinion of one person," he says. "And I dare say that I don't think anyone could give me harsher criticism than myself. I appreciate the good heart of people that give me good reviews. I very often think they're undeserved."

Though he may be cautious about discussing his own talent, one subject that sends him into hyperbolic overdrive is his 400-year-old Stradivarius violin, on loan from the Stradivari Society of Chicago.

"Just imagine that you've been driving your whole life in a Hyundai and then you are given a chance to drive a Lamborghini. You realize what driving actually is," he says with a laugh.

So while it may still be the "queen" of instruments, at least Gluzman can say he plays on the king of violins.

Gluzman performs with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 16 and Feb. 19 at Roy Thompson Hall, 60 Simcoe St. Toronto. For tickets call 416-593-4828 or visit www.tso.ca.

HOT ISRAELI BAND YEMEN BLUES TO PLAY TORONTO ON FEB. 26

Yemen Blues, an Israeli nine-piece ensemble whose vibrant sound combines Yemenite-Jewish song and poetry, West African rhythms and American jazz and blues, is performing in Toronto on Feb. 26, hosted by the Ashkenaz Foundation and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation.

A rising star in Israel, band leader and singer Ravid Kahalani recently told the Vancouver-based newspaper Georgia Strait that he regards Tel Aviv as one of the foremost musical centres of the world because newcomers from Morocco, Iraq, various regions of the former Soviet Union and other exotic locales have all enlivened its cultural life.

Ravid Kahalani of Yemen Blues

"There are lots and lots of great things that happen here," Kahalani told the newspaper by telephone for a Jan. 27 cover story. "Great music, and great musicians – all kinds of stuff is happening here."

The son of Yemenite-Jewish parents, the Israeli-born Kahalani comes from a family that has produced numerous singers and musicians over the last few generations. He and bassist and oud player Omer Avital and various other musicians from New York, Israel and Uruguay perform concerts that often become ecstatic celebrations that erupt into dance-fuelled frenzies.

While the music is apolitical, some reviewers interpret the fact that Kahalani sings in Arabic as a gesture meant to form cultural bridges between Jews and Arabs. "Yemen Blues is a language you will understand no matter where you come from," Kahalani said.

Yemen Blues performs in Toronto as part of the band's debut North American tour. The Mod Club, 722 College St., Saturday, Feb. 26. Doors open 8:30 p.m., show begins at 9. Tickets $25 in advance, $30 at the door. 416-979-9979, www.ashkenazfestival.com

Anne Frank* on Stage: Theatre company Shakespeare in Action is mounting a production of The Diary of Anne Frank (as adapted by Wendy Kesselman) with actor Sascha Cole in the title role. The play is being performed in a century-old theatre in Toronto's Central Commerce Collegiate.

It opens on March 1 and runs to March 13, but preview performances for students and the general public begin Feb. 23. Suitable for ages 10 and up. Central Commerce Theatre, 570 Shaw St. (below College). $15, $12. Reservations, 416-703-4881.

Going Hollywood: a literary guide to the Oscars

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

The Social Network, one of 10 contenders for the Best Picture award at the 2010 Academy Awards (set for Feb. 27), tells the story of Facebook billionaire Mark Zuckerberg. Although charmed in business, he is portrayed as an unlikeable Harvard computer nerd with negligible social skills, business ethics or personal charm.

In the opening scene, a young lady walks out from a date with him, calling him "an a." In the closing scene, as he is being sued by various friends and business partners whom he has betrayed, a sympathetic female lawyer pays him a compliment: "You're actually not an a, but you're trying awfully hard to be one." In these two bookend scenes and all that falls in between, it's apparent that the man who taught 500 million Facebook members how to "friend" each other via computer has no idea how to keep a friend in real life.

Some critics see in Zuckerberg a true ironic hero of our times and have proclaimed The Social Network as "best film of the year." In my opinion the cinema has seen better days if The Social Network, with all of its cloying mediocrity, is being so widely hailed.

Although 1939 was the year World War II broke out, it stands out as one of the best years in cinematic history: Best Picture nominees included Gone With the Wind, Mr. Smith Goes to Washington, Ninotchka, Stagecoach, The Wizard of Oz and Wuthering Heights. (GWTW deservedly won.)

The Academy Awards: The Complete History of Oscar (Black Dog & Leventhal), by Gail Kinn and Jim Piazza, gives year-by-year summaries of the films that were nominated and the films that won in a growing number of categories since Oscar was born in 1927. Film connoisseurs will find this large, lavishly illustrated volume an interesting reference work.

The year 1940 also brought forth a goodly share of cinematic gems. Nominees for Best Picture (in 1941) included The Grapes of Wrath, The Great Dictator, The Letter, The Philadelphia Story and Rebecca – the David O. Selznick-Alfred Hitchcock collaboration that ultimately took the golden statue. (Best Director went to John Ford for Grapes of Wrath.)

Another parade of excellencies unfolded at the Academy Awards for 1950. Best Picture contenders included All About Eve, Born Yesterday, Father of the Bride and Sunset Boulevard; the prize went to producer Darryl F. Zanuck for All About Eve. That film's writer-director, Joseph L. Mankiewicz, also won twin Oscars for Best Director and Best Screenplay. (Mankiewicz had accomplished a parallel feat the year before for the less memorable A Letter to Three Wives.) Meanwhile, Sunset Boulevard earned writer-director Billy Wilder an Oscar for Best Story and Screenplay.

Fifty years ago, at the awards ceremony in 1961, Wilder won three Oscars – Best Picture, Best Director, and Best Original Story and Screenplay – for The Apartment (1960). According to author Kevin Lally in his readable biography Wilder Times: The Life of Billy Wilder (Henry Holt & Co.), it was "only the second time – after Leo McCarey's Going My Way victory – that one individual collected three Oscars in a single night." Wilder and his writing partner I. A. L. Diamond gave thank-you speeches that were memorably brief: "Thank you, Billy Wilder," said the one and "Thank you, I.A.L Diamond" said the other.

An Austrian-born Jew, Wilder (1906-2002) began his career as a journalist in Vienna and worked for a time in Berlin. In 1933, he left Germany for Paris – "It wasn't my idea, it was Hitler's" – and soon came to Hollywood, where he and Charles Brackett co-wrote several successful scripts for director Ernst Lubitsch, including Ninotchka starring Greta Garbo. In 1944, he co-wrote the film noir classic Double Indemnity with Raymond Chandler, then Lost Weekend with Brackett. In 1950 came his original film noir classic Sunset Boulevard, followed by several comedies including The Seven Year Itch (1955) with Marilyn Monroe and Some Like It Hot (1959) with Monroe, Jack Lemmon and Tony Curtis.

With The Apartment, which starred Lemmon and Shirley MacLaine, Wilder was at the top of his form. Still, reviewers criticized him for his "amoral" characters: C.C. Baxter (Lemmon), who loans out his apartment for his bosses' adulterous trysts in exchange for the promise of a promotion; and Fran Kubelik (MacLaine), who has an affair with Mr. Sheldrake, the married department boss (Fred MacMurray).

As the '60s opened, America apparently wasn't yet ready for a romantic comedy laden with dark social themes and imperfect heroes, even if decency wins in the end. Baxter, who is smitten with Kubelik, decides to be a "mensch" – a decent human being – and ultimately wins her from the duplicitous Sheldrake. (The Apartment features two of the very few Jewish characters in Wilder's opus – Dr. and Mrs. Dreyfuss – who act as moral compass for Baxter, influencing his understanding of what it means to be a "mensch.")

One of my favourite books on film is author-screenwriter Garson Kanin's book Hollywood, (Viking Press) in which he describes his personal encounters with Wilder, Samuel Goldwyn, Carole Lombard, John Barrymore, Greta Garbo, Marilyn Monroe, Groucho Marx, Charlie Chaplin, Irving Thalberg and other show-biz celebrities. Kanin's portrayal of Goldwyn, the autocratic studio head, includes many of the latter's hilarious malapropisms that have been retold and traded as "Goldwynisms" ever since.

Of a screenplay, Goldwyn would say that "I read part of it all the way through"; of a verbal agreement, that "it wasn't worth the paper it was printed on." Upon meeting Goldwyn for the first time, Kanin is barely able to conceal his amazed delight after the legendary mogul opens with, "Sidney Howard tells me you're a very clever genius." ("Could it be?" Kanin muses. "Had I heard correctly? Did I own, so soon, a personal Goldwynism?")

Kanin (1912-1999), whose own screenplays with wife Ruth Gordon included the witty Tracy-Hepburn romantic comedies Adam's Rib and Pat and Mike, has given us a highly readable and entertaining book filled with sparkling portraits of Hollywood personalities – none more mighty or coveted than the glittering statuette known as Oscar.

Smoskowitz makes a name for himself in the OHL

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

There aren't many Jewish kids at the most elite levels of competitive hockey, but Dylan Smoskowitz is among that select group.

The Richmond Hill native is in his rookie season as a forward with the Ontario Hockey League's (OHL) Barrie Colts and does his best to quash the naysayers who tell him Jewish guys can't play that kind of hockey.

"I really take that to heart," the six-foot, 170-pound centre said. "I want to show everyone that, no matter where you come from or what your background is, you've got a chance.

"You make your own path in life and I want to make a good name for Jewish people and prove that we can [play in the OHL]."

In his first year in the league, which develops many NHL draftees, Smoskowitz had 13 goals and five assists through the first 50 games of the season, putting him in the league's top 20 for rookie scoring.

He registered a hat-trick in the Colts first win of the season on Oct. 6 in Belleville. The rookie-laden Colts, however, inhabit the OHL cellar with only 11 wins and 26 points so far this season.

Playing with the Mississauga Chargers of the Ontario Junior Hockey League in 2009-10, Smoskowitz showed a bit more of a scoring touch, getting 27 goals and 35 assists in 56 games.

Despite that, it's his play at the other end of the ice that Smoskowitz feels is the most important.

"I really take pride in playing strong in my own zone," Smoskowitz said. "It's always nice to score goals, but it's even nicer to keep them out of your own net."

Smoskowitz, who was selected in the 10th round of the 2009 OHL draft, has impressed Colts head coach Dale Hawerchuk.

"He's a pleasure to coach and probably one of our hardest workers," said Hawerchuk, a member of the Hockey Hall of Fame who enjoyed a stellar NHL career, mostly with the Winnipeg Jets.

"Dylan's not the most gifted skater, but he works at it every day. He's got good vision on the ice, and he's one of those guys that keeps getting better on a monthly basis."

For help with his skating, Smoskowitz turned to one of the fastest guys in the league – Guelph Storm forward and fellow Jewish athlete Daniel Erlich.

"I've trained and skated with him a couple of times, and he's a great guy," Smoskowitz said. "He showed me how to get my feet up, going quicker. I've learned a lot from him."

Off the ice, it's been a change for the former Thornhill Secondary student, who went from having a Jewish circle at home to virtually none to speak of in Barrie.

"I haven't come across another Jewish person yet," Smoskowitz said, "but it's OK, because I talk to my friends back home, and they keep me level and all."

In Barrie, there weren't many differences between him and the rest of his teammates – that is, until December rolled around.

"I had to explain how Chanukah works about 800 times in my life," Smoskowitz said. "I've never gotten to celebrate Chanukah with another player on my team. It's always been Christmas."

Fortunately for Smoskowitz, he was able to go home and light the candles for one night during the winter holiday.

"I got to see my family, which was really nice," he said. "I miss them a lot, and it was nice to go home, celebrate, and just be with the family on a holiday."

Smoskowitz may not see much of his family while living in Barrie, but his parents are making sure they're following him.

Dylan Smoskowitz

"My dad's [Michael] been at almost every home game," Smoskowitz said. "My mom [Shirley] tries to come up as much as she can. When my sisters, Jackie and Amanda, aren't dancing, they always come out and support me."

As Smoskowitz pushes toward his goals in the OHL and, perhaps one day, professional hockey, he remembers that his family has helped him to this point.

"They're the reason I am where I am today," he said. "My dad taught me everything I know, and without him, I'd be nowhere.

"My mom didn't know [much] about hockey, but she always kept on top of me to work hard. I definitely wouldn't be here without the help of my family."

Athletes gear up for Jerusalem marathon

Compiled by CJN Staff

Athletes and travellers from around the world will come to Israel to compete in the first-ever Jerusalem International Marathon on March 25.

The race will begin at the Knesset building and bring runners through the rich and varied Jerusalem landscape, offering participants the choice between 6.2-, 13.1- and 26-mile courses, ending in Sacher Park.

The route will include the Sultan's Pool, Jaffa Gate and Zion's Gate, the Jerusalem Theater, the President's Residence, the German Colony in the Emek Refaim district, the Sherover Promenade and, for participants in the full marathon, Ammunition Hill, Mount Scopus and Augustus Victoria.

"We look forward to welcoming athletes from around the world to participate in this one-of-a-kind fitness competition," said Oded Grofman, consul for tourism at the Israel Government Tourist Office – Canada. "The race will provide unprecedented views of one of the world's most historically rich and beautiful cities."

The race will also provide cash prizes to the top five marathon runners and feature a pre-event health and sports exhibition at the International Convention Center in Jerusalem, March 22 to 24.

Canadian helps victims of terror

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

Yehuda Poch says we have forgotten the victims of terror.

Poch is the director of communications for One Family Fund, a Jerusalem-based non-profit that sprung up during the second intifadah to help Israeli victims of terror.

"Fundraising has tapered off now that victims are no longer in the media and people don't see terror attacks in the news anymore," says Poch, 39, who made aliyah from Toronto in 1997.

In 2001, the worst year for terrorism in Israel, and the year the organization was founded, it was a large Israeli charity with a budget just over $5 million (US), compared to $3.6 million in 2010. In shekel terms, the fund's budget fell from about 22.5 million shekels in 2002 to about 13 million in 2010.

Says Poch, this is a tragedy because although attacks are no longer in the headlines (not to mention a lack of media coverage on attack attempts), victims of the second intifadah are still in need of help. "They are not in need of emergency care anymore, but instead long-term care," says Poch, who lists post-traumatic stress syndrome, emotional rehabilitation, permanent physical health issues and miscellaneous costs among the population's top needs.

For example, a child orphaned by the intifadah at age 10 who is now in university needs tuition funds. "The needs are changing because the population is changing," says Poch. "The attack may have happened many years ago, but it will be with them every day of their lives for the rest of their lives, and we need to understand that to help them."

It is up to the Diaspora to help, he says. "The people who live in Israel are the anchor of the Jewish nation. It's because they are here on the front lines that Jews can live in the Diaspora, and so we need to strengthen this connection between the Diaspora and Israel."

Poch has dedicated his life to strengthening this connection. It all started when he was 16 years old, and a yeshiva student in Ottawa. "Even then I knew that I wanted to work in some way to help the Jewish nation," he says.

He joined the Soviet Jewry movement and successfully petitioned for the release of two families who were allowed to immigrate to Israel. "It gave me a really good feeling to know that someone I was trying to help got the help they needed," he says.

When the first intifadah broke out in 1987 and Israel was being slammed by the media, Poch wrote letters to the Canadian government and to foreign governments that had chosen to boycott Israel, published news articles and initiated rallies in Ottawa. Eventually, his Jewish community activism earned him a co-operative education credit.

He also got involved in Israel activism as a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and later as an undergraduate student of international relations, political science and history at the University of Toronto.

Finally, in 1997, at the age of 25, Poch made aliyah. "I always wanted to come here," says the Ramat Beit Shemesh-based father of five. He was followed to Israel by his three brothers in 2002 and finally by his parents in 2003.

It was equally important for him to continue working in the service of the Jewish nation, as a resident of Israel. "I couldn't just do a job to do a job. I needed to work to help other people," he says.

After taking positions doing public relations for Tel Aviv University and Ezer Mizion, the Israel Health Support Organization, Poch began advising various non-profits on their PR efforts.

It wasn't until five years later, in May 2003, that he finally discovered his true calling, when One Family Fund, which was founded by Vancouver-born Mark Belzberg, announced it was looking for a public relations specialist.

"The causes that spoke to me the most were those attached to the political reality in Israel. I wanted something where I could address people outside of Israel about the situation in Israel," says Poch. "Although hunger is an issue inside of Israel, it doesn't grab people's attention on an international level. Terrorism does."

Along with doing PR for One Family Fund, Poch handles requests from victims and meets with donors. "My work [with One Family] is the most rewarding work I have ever done," he says. "I consider it the realization of my lifelong goal of helping the people and State of Israel."

Says Poch, the work has given him a deeper appreciation of the way people live in Israel. "This job has put me in touch with Israelis of all geographic, socio-economic, religious and cultural backgrounds – immigrants from everywhere," he says. "Terrorism is a great equalizer.

"It has been very enlightening. I am getting a real picture of what it is to be a part of the Jewish nation:"

Yehuda Poch speaks to a group of OneFamily donors.

He adds that "you're Canadian because you live in Canada. You're American because you live in the U.S. But you are Israeli because you are Jewish, which is not how it works anywhere else.

"In Israel, when you are doing something for the country, you are doing something for the people as well, since the people are very much a part of the country and the country very much a part of the people here. I find it [this aspect of the work] very rewarding."

It is also, of course, very emotionally challenging. "I have seen and heard stories that would make most people cringe," says Poch. "Sometimes I get depressed when I'm not able to help, but that's the whole beauty of where I'm working and what I'm doing – that we are there to help."

The most basic need of all victims, he says, is to feel that they are not alone, since even though they know that terrorism has affected one in 60 households in the country, they all report feeling alone. "They need to know that there are people out there who care about them," says Poch.

In retrospect, Poch says he can see how his whole life led to the place where he is now. "One Family brings together a lot of my experience, and now when I look back at it I can see where everything was leading.

"On the other hand, it's still part of a journey," he says. "I don't know where I'll be in 10 to 15 years from now, but I know I will continue to work for the country, the nation, the people."

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Rock Legend takes on Israeli Apartheid Week

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

In order to counter Israeli Apartheid Week, one woman is using Israeli music to show a different side of the country.

Ravid Dahan, in conjunction with her booking agency Motek Productions, is hosting two concerts with Israeli artists in response to Apartheid Week, which this year is from March 7 to 20. Israeli Apartheid Week is held annually in cities and on campuses around the world, with the goal of delegitimizing Israel and encouraging the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement.

On March 3, Shalom Hanoch, widely considered one of Israel's rock music legends, is performing at the Bathurst Street Theatre in Toronto.

On March 12, Asaf Avidan, who Rolling Stone magazine called a "26-year-old genius," will be performing at the Gladstone Hotel as part of Canadian Music Fest .

The idea to counter Israeli Apartheid Week, Dahan said, started in 2010, when Motek Productions brought the Israeli hip-hop band Hadag Nahash to Toronto.

"Last year we did [this] on a small scale, so we decided this year to make a big impact," she said. "The first important aspect to me is that people will see [Israel] differently. The other thing that is important to me is that the Jews, that the Israelis, that the students that go to school... don't feel ashamed of walking into their university during [Apartheid Week]."

In advance of Apartheid Week, Motek hosted another event on Feb. 13, a free concert with Geva Alon, also at the Gladstone Hotel. Alon is travelling to cities across Canada as well, including Vancouver, Victoria, Hamilton and London.

Motek Productions specializes in bringing Israeli artists to perform in North America throughout the year and exposing a wide variety of people, not just the Jewish and Israeli communities, to Israeli culture.

"[We try to] show a different face of Israel to Canadians who don't really know what we are, what we're doing and what Israel has to offer," Dahan said. "It's not only about the conflict.

"It hurts me when people don't know enough about [Israel], and I blame this on us... anyone who's lived in Israel, been to Israel or knows about Israel can do something. If it's one person or a million people, big changes start small."

Dahan, who moved to Canada from Israel, spent nine years travelling before settling in Toronto. She moved to Toronto because of the strong possibility to effect change.

"Toronto is my baby," she said. "I'm part of this community, and I do want to make change. I believe that we can. [If] there is a place in the world that we can do that it's in Toronto, because of the culture."

With this particular series of concerts, Dahan is aiming to reach out beyond the Jewish community by making them more mainstream and accessible, which she said is being done by having Avidan perform during the Canadian Music Fest, and by bringing Alon to the Gladstone for a free concert.

Dahan wanted Alon to perform before Apartheid Week to keep the focus where she says it belongs – on the music, not the politics.

"With Geva Alon, we don't bring him during Apartheid Week, we're bringing him...

Asaf Avidan & the Mojos

Shalom Hanoch

before. Why? Because then we're dealing with the meaning, not the... politics around it. We're able to get people before [Apartheid Week starts]."

Motek Productions has received a lot of support from members of both the Canadian and Israeli communities, Dahan said, mentioning Dori Segal from Gazit-Globe, an Israeli real estate investment company. Amir Gissin, the consul general of Israel for Toronto, has also been very helpful, she added.

"I wish we had more Gissins in the world. His obligation to his job is something that I don't see a lot, and I meet a lot of people," Dahan said. "He cares about Apartheid Week and he's here to make a change, not only because of his job."

Dahan hopes that people will take away from the concerts an appreciation of Israeli music and culture and a sense of duty to encourage a different attitude toward Israel.

"I want people to be united through music. I want people to appreciate Israeli culture... In Israel there are many new artists, and we need to give them an opportunity.

"If each person listens to even one song, even just one artist that [Motek] brings in, they will understand Israel more. And then our community will be stronger."

Synagogues reduce energy costs

What role should a synagogue play in helping its members live a more sustainable existence? Should a synagogue lead by example or just respond to the requirements of their boards and their members. Are we dealing with a business decision or a spiritual imperative?

Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman of Temple B'nai Tikvah in Calgary was one of the first in the Canadian Reform movement to dedicate one of his Shabbat talks to putting a green spin on parshat Noach. His talk focused on the responsibility mankind has for stewardship of the Earth and taking care of the planet. The Reform movement has even dedicated time and resources to helping its congregations become more sustainable. [http://bit.ly/tsj1102-01]

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

The rabbi brought an interesting proposition to his congregation in 2007, after visiting the local Ikea store and finding out that it was powered by renewable energy from southern Alberta wind farms. The synagogue board agreed about the spiritual value of renewable energy and decided to pay the premium for this power once the rabbi secured a synagogue member willing to sponsor the effort. The rabbi succeeded in finding a member connected with the oil industry willing to be that sponsor. Today, the temple uses Bullfrog Power, a green electricity provider, and draws renewable energy from Alberta's power grid. [http://bit.ly/tsj1102-02]

Alan Levine and Michael Charendoff, of the Reconstructionist Congregation Darchei Noam, recently took me on a tour of their building in Toronto. The former Adath Shalom Congregation building, it was bought by Darchei Noam in 2004 and was "re-skinned" with a new exterior. A third-floor addition was built, too. The synagogue reopened in January 2008.

Various congregational committees were involved in the selection of heating, cooling and water systems, ensuring the building could operate in an environmentally respectful way. Sustainable materials were chosen to create a comfortable and inviting interior, minimizing environment impact.

Today, the congregation reduces its energy costs by selling electricity from 22 roof-mounted solar panels to the Ontario power grid. The energy consumption of the building is significantly less than other similar institutional buildings. [http://bit.ly/tsj1102-03]

Ontario's electricity rates are expected to increase by 46 per cent in the next five years, independent of pre-election 10 per cent rebates. Shortly, time-of-use charging will extend from residential homes to institutional buildings such as synagogues and communal organizations funded by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Are the lower five-year fixed electricity rates being offered to these institutions so attractive once you map energy consumption to the time it is consumed? Once you add the global adjustment cost into proposals currently in front of these institutions, do the expected savings still remain? [http://bit.ly/tsj1102-04]

"Communal organizations should focus their budgets on providing services to their constituents. More funds are available for the Jewish mission when operational cost savings around energy consumption are put in place," said Gary Siepser, federation's senior vice-president.

"We are aware of energy efficiency efforts currently underway and will be calling together representatives of our stakeholder community to share best practices, identify programs and methodologies they can leverage and help them avoid known pitfalls."

ZINGERMAN'S ANN ARBOR MUSHROOM & BARLEY SOUP

2 tbls dried porcini mushrooms
2 tbls margarine
1 lg onion, thinly sliced
2 ribs celery with leaves, diced
1/4 c parsley, chopped
1 carrot, peeled & sliced
3 cloves garlic, chopped
1 lb mushrooms
1 tbls flour
2 qts beef broth or water
1 c whole barley
2 tsp salt

Soak porcini mushrooms 1/2 hr. in enough hot water to cover. Strain; reserve water. Coarsely chop these mushrooms. Melt margarine in pot; sauté onion, celery, 2 tbls. parsley, carrot, garlic, fresh mushrooms until soft, about 5 min. Lower heat; add flour, stirring for about 5 min or until thick. In a soup pot, heat broth or water. Add a cup of mushroom mixture at a time to the pot, stirring. Turn heat to high, add reserved mushroom water & barley. Stir well; add salt to taste. Simmer covered about 1hr. or until barley is tender and soup is thickened, stirring often. Add additional chopped parsley, mix thoroughly, adjust seasonings.

The Middle East: peace or bust?

What has caused the bid for change in the Arab world? How will it play out for the Arab people? For Israel? What are we thinking here at home about the new world?

Revolutions and uprising generally grow from vast amounts of jaded negativity and the strengthening of a people's core. In the cast of Egypt, the people have come to sense that what exists outside their walls is different than what transpires within them.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

For 30 years, Hosni Mubarak has run the country under a state of emergency. He's been responsible for vast human rights abuses and has a propensity to take down anyone he perceives as his nemesis. According to Amnesty International, human right activists are often arrested and tortured in Egypt. People have lived in fear of their government, army and those who were supposed to give them security. As well, poverty is rampant, as is hunger.

Meanwhile, Iraq was invaded by the Americans, creating an alternative form of government in the Arab world, a move that will ultimately turn former U.S. president George W. Bush into a hero. It's safe to say, too, that Israel's democracy has had an enormous impact on the Arab world. Similarly, the Internet came to Egypt and offered its people the ability to watch and learn from free societies in which criticizing the government is encouraged and freedom of speech is protected by law.

A combination of these things has created a cauldron of anger and desire for freedom among Egypt's 80 million people and their neighbours. The outcome of this has been masses in the streets and a cry for change.

There are many within our community who are deeply frightened by how this situation will play out. They cite statistics that say close to 30 per cent of the Arab world supports the Muslim Brotherhood, along with public humiliation and hangings, cutting off thieves' hands and annihilating Israel. This school of thought sees Arab nations as highly tribalized and saddled with archaic laws and, therefore, unable to change, ever.

Then there are those who watch the Middle East unravel, or perhaps come together, and instead hope that the nations that currently espouse antisemitic and anti-Israel sentiments and are highly patriarchal will suffer for many years – as the Russian people did following Glasnost – but ultimately come around so that democracy is an accepted form of government in the region.

Who is right? And how will Israel fare in all of this?

I, like you, have made my prediction, based on my armchair view of history and a dream.

The Arab nations are the world's last real dictatorships. They've lagged behind for years. But throughout history, such nations have changed. Why wouldn't Syria, Egypt, Libya, etc., follow that path? Will there be bloodshed? Yes. Will Israel be threatened, attacked and undermined? Yes.

But why isn't it possible that in the years following – and it will take years– once all the anger, distrust and ugliness is worked through, a kinder, gentler aspect of the Arab psyche will rise to the surface and more peaceful times will be upon us?

Why would we think that Arabs, unlike others, can't change? What makes us believe that peace isn't closer as we watch Arab governments fall and the Egyptian people fight for their own rights?

Am I right? I hope so. Is this dream possible? I believe so.

Tribute to a historic flag

The Statue of the Ink Flag was recently installed in Eilat. The statue recalls the moment during Israel's War of Independence when soldiers of the Alexandroni Brigade captured Eilat. To claim the location for the nascent state, the soldiers planted a makeshift Israeli flag they had made from a white sheet on which they drew the Star of David from a handy bottle of ink. The archival photo, inset, shows Avram Adan (Bren) of Kfar Giladi raising the improvised flag. (Flash90 photo)

Canada blasts Tehran's abuses

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Lawrence Cannon called out Iran for its government's "egregious" handling of renewed popular reform protests last week.

The foreign affairs minister made the remarks after Liberal MP and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler called for an all-party emergency debate on Iran in the House of Commons on Feb. 16. Cannon slammed Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps for its recent brutal crackdown on its own people, calling it "an offence to reasonable people the world over" and saying they must stop.

Lawrence Cannon

Cotler said he spearheaded the debate to refocus his fellow parliamentarians and Canadians and "sound the alarm" on the "unprecedented escalation" of state-sanctioned violence by the Iranian regime against its people, which it has undertaken while the international community was caught up in the sweeping changes occurring in North Africa.

"While the eyes of the world are understandably on Egypt, Iranian executions of opposition members have escalated to the rate of one every eight hours. The government of Iran is on an execution binge, even by wanton Iranian standards," Cotler said.

He added: "Iran is now engaged in a wholesale assault on the rights of its own people, including a state-orchestrated wave of arrests, detentions, beatings, torture, kidnappings, disappearances and executions."

Referring to events in the Iranian parliament last week, where frenzied calls for the execution of opposition members were made by the judiciary and members of parliament, and to the continued arrests and brutalization of the country's grassroots "Green Revolution" leaders – those who led the massive 2009 protests against the government after the alleged rigged elections – Cannon said Canada will not let up its pressure on the Ahmadinejad regime.

"The flagrant disregard and egregious abuse of the most basic human rights by the Iranian authorities have always been and will continue to be denounced by our government and by the House," Cannon said.

Doctor Suspended

MONTREAL — Lung specialist Dr. Barry Rabinovitch was suspended last week for four months and fined $3,000 by the Quebec College of Physicians last week for secretly filming female patients while they were naked, Canadian Press reported. Rabinovitch, an associate professor of medicine at McGill University, filmed 10 to 15 women between January and May 2009 at two clinics where he works – the Montreal Chest Institute and the Queen Elizabeth Health Complex. Rabinovitch, a 56-year-old married father of two, pleaded guilty before a disciplinary council of inappropriately filming the women during cardio-pulmonary exams.

WORLD

Leftist Trip Planned

NEW YORK — The liberal pro-Israel lobby group J Street is launching its own Israel trip for Jewish students after Birthright Israel declined to partner with it. In a fundraising letter to supporters, J Street said it will organize a trip to Israel and the West Bank for 10 to 15 student leaders this summer. A donor agreed to match every dollar up to $15,000 to fund it. J Street started promoting a trip last month to be run in co-operation with Israel Experience, one of several Birthright tour providers. But Birthright said it nixed the idea for a J Street trip focused on progressivism and social action when it was first proposed months ago, saying it no longer works with groups with Israel-related political leanings. J Street said more than 100 students were interested in the proposed Birthright trip.

Tunisian Jews Worry

TUNIS — Tunisia's Jewish community is fearful for its security after anti-Jewish protests outside the capital's main synagogue, a community leader said. The head of the community met recently with the country's interim prime minister, Mohammed Ghanoucci, and requested better security for the country's 1,500 Jews, the AFP news agency reported. On Feb. 11, dozens of Muslim demonstrators gathered in front of the main shul in the capital, Tunis, and chanted anti-Jewish epithets. Last month, amid the political upheaval and violence in the African nation that toppled President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, the military deployed forces to protect the Jewish community on the southern island of Djerba and elsewhere.

Deportation Upheld

CHICAGO — A U.S. appeals court upheld a deportation order against a Chicago man who was stripped of his citizenship for his role in a Nazi-operated Ukrainian police unit. The Feb. 14 ruling upheld the 2007 deportation order against Osyp Firishchak, who immigrated to the United States in 1949 from what is now Ukraine and became a U.S. citizen five years later. Firishchak, who was born in Trebuszany, was stripped of his citizenship in 2005 for concealing his service in the Nazi-sponsored Ukrainian Auxiliary Police service when he came to America. The unit helped kill more than 100,000 Jews in Nazi-occupied Lvov, Poland (now Ukraine), in World War II.

Archeologists Find Oldest Mikvah in U.S.

BALTIMORE — Archeologists have found what they believe to be the oldest mikvah in America.

The 1845 ritual bath was uncovered under the Lloyd Street Synagogue in East Baltimore, which is now part of the Jewish Museum of Maryland. The dig is being led by Esther Doyle Read, a lecturer in ancient studies at the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, and is being funded by the museum, the university and the Maryland Historical Trust, the Baltimore Sun reported.

The bath was first detected during excavations in 2001, and more digging this winter uncovered part of a five-foot-deep wooden tub linked to a cistern and a brick hearth that once warmed the mikvah's water.

The mikvah was built under a former rowhouse that was used as a shul, which was taken over by the Lloyd Street Synagogue when it expanded in 1860. The filled-in bath is steps away from more modern tile-lined mikvahs built after 1905 by a congregation that bought the building from the Catholic Church after it had changed hands a number of times.

"The first congregation here was German," Read said, adding that the mikvah "was a very busy place for this small community of German immigrants."

Multiculturalism comes under fire

Canadian professor says policy based on a lie

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It wasn't a particularly good week for multiculturalism.

First, British Prime Minister David Cameron took dead aim at "the doctrine of state multiculturalism," saying – in a Feb. 5 speech on radicalization and Islamic extremism – that it had failed in England.

A few days later, French President Nicolas Sarkozy echoed the sentiment, arguing that as a policy, multiculturalism "is a failure."

Those comments were preceded by others from German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who declared German efforts to promote multiculturalism had "failed totally."

Canada was not immune to the trend of public pronouncements. Around the time Cameron was voicing concerns that Britain had "encouraged different cultures to live separate lives, apart from each other and the mainstream," political science professor Salim Mansur issued a policy document titled The Muddle of Multiculturalism; A Liberal Critique. It argued that Canadian multiculturalism was based on a lie, is divisive and should be overturned.

As part of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, multiculturalism will be a difficult principle to rescind. As a practical matter, it's a fact of life in Canada. According to the 2006 census, 43 per cent of the population is neither aboriginal, English nor French. And in 2010, Canada set a 50-year immigration record, admitting more than 280,000 people (China and India are traditionally important sources of immigrants).

Iran versus its people

"Iran is engaged in a wholesale assault on the rights of its own people, including a state-orchestrated wave of arrests, detentions, beatings, torture, kidnappings, disappearances and executions."

Those words were written by Liberal MP Irwin Cotler at the beginning of this month. He was referring to the brutally sadistic campaign of oppression and repression of the people of Iran by the government of Iran. Cotler sorrowfully observed that during a 5-1/2-week period from Dec. 20 until the end of January, the Iranian rulers executed people at a rate of one every eight hours.

Iran's "execution binge" as Cotler referred to it, took place while the media of the world were not looking at Iran, so to speak. They were focused on events in North Africa.

From the editor's desk...

The media's focus of attention is still on North Africa. But some of the spotlight has shifted to Iran as well.

Returning to the same streets on which they marched in protest of the election that President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad stole from them in June of 2009, tens of thousands of ordinary Iranians are loudly clamouring for freedom and liberty after the remarkable fashion of Tunisians and Egyptians.

Unlike the Egyptian army, however, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and their confederates, the Basij militia, unleashed bloody hell on their fellow citizens. They viciously set upon demonstrators in Tehran, Isfahan and Shiraz. As of this writing last week, a demonstrator had been killed by security forces.

The ghoulish embrace of violence was repeated in the Iranian parliament itself.

In a frightening display of frenzy, madness and mayhem, more than 200 legislators last week cried out for opposition leaders to face trial and then be put to death. A trial, they conceded, was a nuisance but necessary. On the other hand, the lawmakers forgot to provide for a right of appeal before sentencing.

"Death to Mousavi, Karroubi and Khatami" (opposition leaders Mir Hossein Mousavi, Mahdi Karroubi and former president Mohammad Khatami) echoed through the legislative chamber like a macabre mantra at a convention of murderers.

Speaker Ali Larijani explained the popular uprising happening beyond the walls of the parliament on the usual basis: he blamed the United States, Britain and Israel.

"The parliament condemns the Zionists, American, anti-revolutionary and anti-national action of the misled seditionists."

This time, however, Washington answered back. It found the voice it had inexplicably lost when Iranians took to the streets in 2009.

"Let me, clearly and directly, support the aspirations of the people who are in the streets in Iran today," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton told reporters last week.

"What we see happening in Iran today is a testament to the courage of the Iranian people and an indictment of the hypocrisy of the Iranian regime – a regime that over the last three weeks has constantly hailed what went on in Egypt," Clinton said.

"We wish the opposition and the brave people in the streets across cities in Iran the same opportunities that they saw their Egyptian counterparts seize."

Clinton, of course, was quite correct in calling the Iranian rulers hypocrites.

One week earlier, the Iranian leader, Ayatollah Ahmad Khatami, appropriated the events in Egypt and Tunisia for his own self-serving ends. He taunted the West.

"I herewith proclaim to those (western leaders) who still do not want to see the realities that the political axis of the new Middle East will soon be Islamic rulership and a democracy based on religion.

"All these protests in Egypt, Tunisia, Jordan and Yemen are inspired by Iran's Islamic revolution, and these countries are de facto rocked by the aftershock of the Iranian revolution," Khatami added.

The protests Khatami celebrated in Egypt and Tunisia, he condemned in his own country. He condemned them because he fears them.

He is not embarrassed by the truth because his medieval worldview cannot accommodate the truth. The window through which he peers each day is draped by a curtain of intolerance and extremism, and a uniquely cruel indifference to the hopes and aspirations of the ordinary people on the streets whose lives he considers himself divinely directed to control.

As is his trademark, Cotler minces no words in characterizing the actions of the Iranian regime. "Iran leads the world in per capita executions, including the execution of children. The government has targeted labour rights and has imprisoned and even murdered the lawyers who defend the accused. All told, Iran's government's actions constitute crimes against humanity under international law."

Iran is not only at odds with much of the world. It is at odds with much of its own people. – MBD

Elizabeth Wolfe begins term as Chair, UJA Federation Board

Community leader cites her belief in organization's importance in accepting new role

By Daniel Horowitz

When Elizabeth Wolfe began her role as Chair of UJA Federation's Board in November, 2010, it was almost a case of her fulfilling a destiny. With her life-long involvement in UJA Federation, and with her parents, Ray and Rose Wolfe, both having served as UJA Board Chairs, the tradition continues.

"I've been involved with Federation in one form or another, my whole life," says Elizabeth, a graduate of Harvard University and the University of Toronto's Faculty of Law. "We grew up with UJA Federation and so for me not to take the position would be to challenge all the commitments that I've made to the Federation over the last 30 years. It was a natural progression to my involvement throughout my lifetime."

But it's clearly not a sense of familial obligation that enticed Elizabeth to accept this heady and time-consuming endeavour. When she speaks of UJA Federation, the pride she feels is obvious.

"It's been a significant piece of my life and I believe in the organization," says Elizabeth. "I believe in the importance of the organization and its role in the community and if we are involved as lay leaders, and as volunteers, and we are not prepared to step up and assume positions of responsibility, then what are we doing here? Imagine a Toronto without UJA Federation and you immediately understand its significance. Imagine a community that does not raise the dollars to provide for the needs of its most vulnerable within a Jewish context. Imagine a community with disparate agencies that do not have a mechanism to coordinate initiatives or advocate for improved funding and social change. Imagine a community where schools operate in isolation with no financial assistance for tuition. Imagine a community with no funded Jewish programming on our university campuses. Imagine a community that doesn't raise money for Israel, does not encourage or promote Israel engagement and does not advocate on its behalf. Imagine a community that could not respond to anti-Semitic attacks or the campaign to delegitimize Israel. Federation enables us to leverage our strength through combined efforts, in pursuit of our common purpose."

Jen Arron Photographs

Elizabeth Wolfe

Wolfe recently returned from a Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) Investment Institute in Palm Springs featuring 300 participants, where her pride for Jewish Toronto was again justified.

"Everyone there recognized the success that Toronto has with its Jewish community, and that Toronto is a vibrant Jewish city with a dynamic Jewish Federation," said Wolfe. "It is perceived as one of, if not the leading Jewish communities in North America. Actually, we are recognized outside of our community and outside of Canada to a much greater extent than we are aware of."

Wolfe realizes that while she had specific priorities when she assumed her role as Chair, flexibility is essential today, as we face a unique and disconcerting climate of increased anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist sentiment.

"As circumstances change, we have to be ready to shift our priorities to meet very altered realities," she explains. "I think we are facing tensions that go beyond our community that we have not seen since the Second World War. We need to strengthen the organization so that it can respond to those changing circumstances since we need to ensure that our role in advocacy for the Jewish community is as effective as it can be while continuing to meet basic needs. I came into this position with pre-existing priorities that are going to be there. We have a capital campaign where we're on a course to develop the infrastructure that's going to continue. Advocacy is on a course that's got to be pushed forward."

The sweet sounds of tzedakah

By Monique Gottlieb

Orli Silverberg is extremely passionate about two things: playing the violin, and making the world a better place. In honour of her bat mitzvah, she decided to combine the two by organizing a violin concert to raise money for children living in Sderot, Israel, with the help of the B'nai Tzédek Teen Philanthropy program at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Before her bat mitzvah, Orli knew she wanted to raise money for a charitable cause. "I know I'm very lucky," explained Orli. "I live in a safe country, and I have everything I need. Other people aren't as fortunate as me, so I wanted to do what I could to help them out."

Orli had always felt a strong connection to Israel. Her mother is Israeli, and her family visits the country at least once a year. When she was in Israel this past summer, her family visited Sderot. Seeing the city and its citizens for herself made a huge impact on Orli. "I think they are so brave to live there. I was really scared when I was there for just one day, and they live there every day of their lives."

After researching various causes, she decided to raise money for the people of Sderot. "I felt like they needed the money the most, out of everything I looked at," explained Orli.

Sderot, located on the border of the Gaza Strip, has been the scene of kassam rocket attacks for over eight years. Its citizens live in constant fear, yet most of them choose to stay there to stand their ground on Israel's behalf.

Back in Toronto, the Silverbergs sent out invitations to their family and friends, inviting them to their home for the concert while asking for a donation to go towards the people of Sderot. With her decade of experience playing the violin, and the help of her little sister, Orli put on a phenomenal show. She and her family were blown away by the generosity of the 80 loved ones who came out to support the cause and collectively contributed $5,000.

Through B'nai Tzedek, Orli is able to decide where her donations will go – in this case, helping Sderot's children.

Raising money for Sderot made Orli feel more connected to the people living there. Now that she has had a taste of how it feels to give, Orli is addicted. A lot of people contributed, and she realized that she has so much potential to do good in the world, even at such a young age. "Getting involved and giving to charity is such a great thing. Before I actually did it, I had no idea how good it would make me feel. Instead of people buying gifts for me, I am helping people who are really less fortunate. It feels amazing."

CJC seeks 'shalom bayit' between rabbi, Kulanu

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress says it hopes to ease tensions between the city's main Jewish gay and lesbian group and a prominent Orthodox rabbi that arose in the wake of last summer's Gay Pride parade.

As reported in a JTA story published in the Feb. 11 edition of The CJN, York Regional Police (YRP) chaplain Rabbi Mendel Kaplan – spiritual leader of Chabad @ Flamingo in Thornhill – was recently investigated by the force in part for allegedly making "vile" and "hateful" remarks about gays and lesbians to his congregation in a sermon last summer.

Justine Apple

A six-month YRP investigation concluded earlier this month with the exoneration of Rabbi Kaplan. It was touched off by a complaint against the rabbi filed by Kulanu Toronto, a Hillel-affiliated advocacy and social group for Jewish gays and lesbians, both for his alleged sermon and for what the group described as a "homophobic" e-mail he sent to a group of rabbis about his position on the Gay Pride parade.

Last summer, Kulanu placed a full-page ad in the Toronto Star prior to the Parade urging the community to support gay Jews to help counter an anti-Israel group, Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, which was planning to march. The ad was co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canada-Israel Committee and Congress.

According to Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, Rabbi Kaplan focused on the ad in a sermon prior to the parade that excoriated her group and those supporting it.

Although Rabbi Kaplan was cleared by the YRP probe, Apple believes his role as chaplain is inconsistent with the values of diversity and inclusiveness that a police chaplain should espouse. She said Kulanu planned to send a letter to York Police Chief Eric Jolliffe about the decision to retain him in the role.

Apple said her organization was still considering talking to Rabbi Kaplan. But she added that she and her board members were "not sure" whether gay Jews in York region would feel comfortable talking to a chaplain who is perceived to be anti-gay.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said last week that "we just want to bring some shalom bayit to the situation" by bringing the two sides together, if Kulanu chooses that option.

"Whatever decision [Kulanu] decides upon, CJC will continue to try to help find a way to resolve this issue comfortably. But no matter what Kulanu does, it won't negate the need for dialogue," he said.

Asked about his position on the issue of the Pride Parade and Kulanu, Rabbi Kaplan said he believes some people have "misinterpreted" his intent and remarks.

"I don't take exception to people who march wherever they want. I don't discriminate against anybody. We're all treated equally. We're all children of God. I believe that tolerance and respect is important for our society," he said.

"I'm trying to make it clear… at the time I delivered the sermon, my reaction was not to the Pride parade, per se. My reaction was to the fact that the flagship institutions of the Jewish people publicly proclaimed that Torah values are not necessarily Jewish values," the rabbi added.

"This is really an internal Jewish issue. This has nothing to do with the general population. This has nothing to do with gay rights. This is entirely focused on what is appropriate for the Jewish community to formally endorse. A flagship institution that claims to represent the entire Jewish community cannot embrace any values or ideals that are antithetical to the Torah and still proclaim to represent the whole community."

UJA campaign comes to a close

Special to The CJN

Canadians and Jews: "great sense of humour, no self-esteem," says comedy writer/producer Mike Reiss.

Toward the end of his speech, Reiss, best known for writing and producing The Simpsons, thanked the crowd at the UJA Campaign 2011 closing event for supporting the "worthy cause."

"I want to thank you… for donating your time and donating your money to this worthy cause, whatever the hell it is. I think we're buying skullcaps for dogs."

While not quite on par with skullcaps for dogs, for the hundreds of people who gathered Feb. 15 at Toronto's Westin Prince Hotel, the cause was important.

Campaign co-chair Sherry Firestone said this year's campaign had excellent results.

Compared to the 2010 campaign, she said, overall gifts from donors have increased, as well as the number of donors – 900 new ones and 700 previous donors who did not contribute in 2010. The 2011 campaign also attracted 800 canvassers, more than in many years, who helped raise more than $53.8 million to date, for UJA initiatives.

"We truly change people's lives for the better, in both the short and the long term," said fellow campaign chair Jeff Rosenthal.

Last year's campaign raised a total of $64 million, but as of February 2010, when last year's campaign closing was held, UJA had raised slightly less than this year's total to date, approximately $53 million.

"The official campaign closing celebration is never the closing of funds coming in," federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN. "We will have a much better idea [of the final total] in a few months."

Lisa Draper, UJA's chair of campaign operations, introduced the 51-year-old Reiss by showing clips from two episodes of The Simpsons, where the family visits Toronto and Israel.

"We are going to have a lot of fun over the next six or seven hours," Reiss said by way of introduction. "That's a joke of course. It won't be fun at all."

'Iran, the greatest moral corruption'

The sight was so horrific, it was surreal; so surreal as to have bordered on fantasy. Except, alas, it was not fantasy. It was disgustingly true. More than 200 members of the parliament of Iran, in the legislative chamber of parliament, last week shouted and remonstrated their malevolence and hatred toward their own people, calling for the trial and execution of the opposition leaders urging the regime to reform.

"It was an abominable sight... to see on television the Iranian parliament standing and calling for the killing of opposition forces in the name of the 'democracy' of [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad," Israeli President Shimon Peres said of the disturbing spectacle.

Humane, freedom-loving peoples around the world share the revulsion expressed by Peres. None has expressed that legal or personal revulsion more insistently and eloquently than Liberal MP Irwin Cotler. (Please see "From the editor's desk," page 4.)

In the House of Commons last week, Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon rebuked the Ahamadinejad government clearly and solemnly. He spoke forcefully and with great resolve.

"Actions taken by the Iranian authorities against peaceful protesters in Tehran... give our government much cause for concern. The hypocrisy of the Iranian authorities' support for democracy in Egypt and the suppression of the same demands in Iran is outright unacceptable. The use of tear gas, batons and pepper spray against peaceful protesters by Iranian security forces is a gross violation of the right to free expression and assembly."

In his remarks, Cannon poignantly reminded Canadians that the brutality against the Iranian people of late has "a long history." He recalled Tehran's violent repression of the people's protests in the summer of 2009. He also placed on the record the names of many "ordinary" Iranians whose lives today are being threatened. Cannon promised that the government "will continue to take Iran to task for its continued violations of human rights and freedom of expression and association."

We commend the government for its blunt, no-nonsense approach to Iran's abominable behaviour. We urge other governments to follow suit. We urge UN secretary general Ban Ki Moon to do so as well. The matter is urgent, and the full level of the Iranian leaders' cruelty is still unmeasured.

Peres last week referred to Iran as "the greatest moral corruption in the world." One cannot disagree with him. One can only heed his words as a warning. The danger is real.

The police (1)

Avrum Rosensweig's column concerning the "efficiency and fairness of the Toronto police" misrepresents the Jewish community's general relationship with and feelings about the police. ("The police: a need for change," Feb. 10). Statements that the Jewish community only comes into contact with the police force when speeding tickets are issued or at the Walk for Israel are at best erroneous, and the statement that the community regards the force as "heavy-handed and racist" is insulting to our community and to the police force.

I have experienced the police force in action, and the attending officers have always been professional and courteous in performing their tasks. Now this is not to say that our police force is perfect. And in the last year we have witnessed questionable decisions made and actions by Ontario's premier, Toronto's chief of police and by several officers. But these matters are currently being investigated and being discussed by many citizens. The majority of Toronto Jews I am in contact with still have confidence in the Toronto police force. As a writer in a Jewish newspaper, one has to be very careful how one rebukes a member of our community, and even more careful with a person from outside our community.

Much of John Sewell's criticism of the police, as far as I am concerned, is biased and unbalanced ("The police: a need for change," Feb. 10). No doubt there are some officers who abuse their powers, but they are very few. Police deal with much of society's garbage, so it is not uncommon that there will be complaints made in some circumstances.

The G20 in Toronto last June was an immense operation for the officers, who worked under difficult conditions and for long hours.

The 5,500 Toronto police establishment's strength is less than in 1992, when Toronto stopped hiring for three years and lost more than 900 officers due to retirement. This resulted in the investigative units being decimated to provide uniform response to the 2,000 daily dispatched radio calls. This has a negative effect on service.

There is much more to the story of those shot by police than columnist Avrum Rosensweig indicates in a flippant manner. Police meet mentally challenged people as well as criminals in their work, and in crisis conditions, they do not have the benefit of psychiatric consultations.

As a former chair of the Toronto Police Services Board who has been in the field on many occasions, I can attest to the professionalism, patience and accountability that police officers have shown in their duty. It was, therefore, appalling to see what I perceive to be an article creating mistrust in the community against the police.

Pollard's plight different than soldiers

I agree with The CJN editor's view that Jonathan Pollard's plight is dissimilar to those of Israeli soldiers captured in battle ("'Let them go' should include Pollard," letters, Feb. 10). Pollard should be released immediately, for he has been held for a disproportionate amount of time by Israel's closest ally, the United States. However, the Israeli soldiers who are being held by enemies of the Jewish state risked their lives to protect our homeland in the face of the fiercest forces of hatred and evil. In this respect, they diverge from Pollard. They are neither better, nor worse, but merely different. As such, they should be acknowledged separately in the "Let them go" box in the centre of The CJN's letters to the editor page.

'Let's not forget' Pollard

The CJN seems to be reluctant to include Jonathan Pollard in the "Let them go" box in the centre of its letters to the editor page, supposedly because he is not an Israel Defence Forces "soldier who is missing in action" ("'Let them go' should include Pollard," letters, Feb. 10).

Let me, therefore, suggest that The CJN include a separate box, perhaps titled "Let's not forget" or "Let's also remember" for Pollard. This information would heighten readers' awareness of Pollard's case and serve as a constant reminder of the price this poor American Jewish hero, and honorary Israeli citizen, is paying for having helped the people and State of Israel.

Tunisia, then Egypt: who is next?

Uriel Heilman
JTA

With popular uprisings having toppled two Arab dictators in the space of just a few weeks and unrest reverberating across the Middle East, are other regimes likely to fall, too?

Nearly everywhere in the region, autocratic leaders seem to be on the defensive. Using carrots or sticks, and sometimes both, they're struggling to curb growing protest movements.

In Jordan three weeks ago, amid spreading protests, King Abdullah II dismissed his prime minister and cabinet, promising reforms. In the Persian Gulf kingdom of Bahrain, police countered protesters' "Day of Rage" this week with rubber bullets and tear gas, while the king tried to defuse opposition by promising a $2,650 payment of "appreciation" to every Bahraini family. In Kuwait, too, the ruling emir announced cash grants to every citizen.

In Iran last week, government forces used violence to block demonstrators from massing in main squares, despite Tehran's rhetorical support for the uprisings in Tunisia and Egypt. In Yemen and Algeria, protesters and police battled in the streets. In the West Bank, the Palestinian Authority (PA) announced that it would hold long-overdue parliamentary and presidential elections by September, and this week the PA prime minister dismissed his cabinet.

Long a mostly impotent force in Arab politics, the Arab street has suddenly discovered its power, and it's ushering in change from Tunis to Amman – not to mention fraying nerves in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

"Activists in other countries are trying to use the example of Egypt and Tunisia to mobilize large numbers of people to the streets," said David Siddhartha Patel, a political scientist at Cornell University.

Despite the spreading protests, experts cautioned against predicting the collapse of additional regimes. While the Arab street has drawn lessons from Egypt and Tunisia, so have their autocratic rulers.

"Will people demonstrate and protest? Yes," said Barry Rubin, an Israeli scholar at the Herzliya Interdisciplinary Center's program of Global Research in International Affairs. "Will people overthrow governments? I think the answer is no."

The reasoning for every country is different, and the elements that made for the success of Egypt's uprising were a uniquely combustible combination that may not transfer elsewhere.

High unemployment, a yawning rich-poor gap, widespread government corruption and deteriorating quality-of-life metrics made Hosni Mubarak almost universally despised in his country, uniting Islamists and secularists in opposition. Egypt faced a looming succession crisis that undermined the legitimacy of the 82-year-old president, who wanted to hand over power to his son, Gamal.

Once the protests began in earnest, Egypt's government, which receives $1.3 billion in annual U.S. aid, was subject to American pressure on how to confront the demonstrators. Perhaps most significant, the Egyptian army opted to side with the protesters rather than with the regime, declining to use violence against the people and essentially turning what had begun as a popular uprising into a military coup.

That stands in stark contrast to Iran, which put down mass protests a year-and-a-half ago following the disputed re-election of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. The key state security forces did the government's bidding at the time, and with gusto: they beat and shot demonstrators, jailed dissenters and executed organizers.

This time, the regime is making sure that mass protests never materialize by choking off main arteries leading to central squares, deploying hundreds of riot officers and banning marches in solidarity with the uprisings in Egypt and Tunisia.

Already pariahs in the West, Tehran's rulers have little to hold them back from unleashing the full might of their security apparatus to stay in power.

"The Iranian regime acted decisively early on, using security forces ruthlessly against the opposition, unlike Mubarak who hesitated and vacillated," said Manochehr Dorraj, an Iran expert at Texas Christian University. "In Iran, the use of the security forces put shivers in the heart of the demonstrators who knew that they might be killed or executed. And because Iran has oil and gas reserves, it could afford to act autonomously and ignore public opinion and take that defiant posture."

Likewise in Syria, the state security services moved firmly to stifle budding protests, scaring potential opponents into submission through arrests, intimidation and a zero-tolerance policy even for small protest gatherings. Furthermore, the broad popular discontent that fuelled the Egyptian protests is less salient in Syria, where quality-of-life measures have improved in recent years under Bashar Assad.

Syria and Iran have another card to play when it comes to staunching opposition.

"Their anti-U.S. and anti-Israel posture lends them the claim that whoever rises against them are agents of the U.S. and Israel," Dorraj said. "This was not available to Mubarak."

Algeria in many ways looks similar to Egypt, with broad disaffection for the government of President Abdelaziz Bouteflika, youth-led protests gaining steam and widespread strikes. But Algeria's army is unlikely to side with the people against the regime, many analysts say. The same goes for Algeria's neighbour to the east, Moammar Gadhafi's Libya, where dissidents called for a protest to take place last week in Tripoli.

Jordan, the only Arab country besides Egypt to have a peace treaty with Israel, is seen to be in a more vulnerable position. Its ruler hails from a minority group in a country whose population is mostly Palestinian. In recent weeks, even the native Jordanian tribes in the minority that comprise the king's traditional power base went public with charges of corruption against King Abdullah's wife, Queen Rania. Also, the painful domestic effects of the global economic crisis have increased popular discontent in Jordan.

As protests – a recurring presence in the kingdom – gained steam following the unrest in Egypt, King Abdullah moved quickly to announce political reforms, firing his government and installing a new, conservative cabinet designed to placate Jordan's powerful tribes. The moves, and the king's relative popularity compared with Mubarak in Egypt, weigh in Abdullah's favour.

Perhaps the Middle Eastern country most vulnerable to revolution is Yemen, which like Mubarak's Egypt is plagued by high poverty, unemployment, discontent with the regime led by President Ali Abdullah Saleh and, until a few days ago, a looming succession crisis.

Long ravaged by internal conflicts, Yemen is seen as a key front in the war against Al Qaeda and terrorism. If Saleh goes, it's not clear that Yemen's government will remain allied with the West against Islamic extremism. The future of Yemen, like so much in the Middle East, remains uncertain.

The streets are stirring throughout the region

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In the Middle East Feb. 17:

Libya

At least 14 demonstrators were reported to have been killed in clashes with pro-government forces, as protesters seeking to oust longtime leader Moammar Gadhafi defied a crackdown and took to the streets of four cities for what activists have dubbed a day of rage.

An opposition website and an anti-Gadhafi activist said unrest broke out during marches in four Libyan cities Thursday. Organizers were using social networking sites Facebook and Twitter to call for nationwide demonstrations.

"Today the Libyans broke the barrier of fear, it is a new dawn," said Faiz Jibril, an opposition leader in exile.

Yemen

More than 1,000 protesters clashed with government loyalists in Yemen on the seventh straight day of demonstrations, Feb. 17, demanding the end of President Ali Abdullah Saleh's 32-year rule.

Clashes broke out in the capital Sanaa after groups of government loyalists armed with daggers and batons confronted about 1,500 protesters, prompting the police to fire warning shots in the air, witnesses said.

"The people want the fall of the president, the people want the fall of the regime," the protesters chanted.

Witnesses said police appeared to have lost control of the crowds and withdrew from the streets as the rival camps hurled rocks at each other. Dozens were wounded and carried away from the scene.

Bahrain

The Bahraini army seized control of key parts of capital Manama on Feb. 17 and banned gatherings, after a riot police raid on a protest camp left at least three people dead, 231 wounded and 60 more missing.

Armed vehicles rumbled through the capital after police stormed the demonstration square in a government attempt to quell three days of protest.

Hours after the violence unfolded, Bahrain's army said it would take all measures necessary to ensure security, and it is ordering people to avoid central areas of the Gulf Arab kingdom's capital, according to an Interior Ministry spokesman.

At least five people died since protests flared up. Thousands of overwhelmingly Shiite protesters took to Bahrain's streets demanding more say in the Gulf Arab kingdom where a Sunni Muslim family rules over a majority Shiite population.

Sharansky: Zionist and humanist pop star

Gill Troy

Twenty five years ago this month, on Feb. 11, 1986, a KBG agent told Natan Sharansky to walk straight ahead to a car waiting to take him to freedom. Sharansky zig-zagged his way to the car.

This independence of thought had gotten Sharansky into trouble with the Soviet authorities – and saved his life when they tried to break him. He suffered for nine years in the gulag. A chess player, he lived to outwit his KGB tormenters. When they mocked him by showing a clipping of a Free Soviet Jewry rally, saying only housewives and students were standing up for him, he feigned disbelief. They showed him more and more evidence of those rallies – letting him see just how far the message was travelling to free him and three million Jews suffering under Soviet Communism.

While Sharansky's survival reflected his tremendous personal will, his release was a collective accomplishment. He recalls that one thing that kept him going and kept him sane was the simple fact of belonging to the Jewish People. As a part of a story greater than his own individual narrative, he felt supported by others and would not betray them. In prison, he noticed that others, such as the Pentacostalists, who belonged to something greater than their own individual lives fared better, too. That insight shapes his passion for Jewish identity-building and the understanding that through our particular allegiances, we can achieve universal goods.

Belonging to the Jewish people also meant that an army of "students and housewives" mobilized to keep him alive. Here in Canada, the late Andrea Bronfman, at the time Andrea Cohen, helped galvanize the Group of 35 to keep the community aware, the pressure on and Soviet Jewish hopes alive. Prof. Irwin Cotler led the crackerjack legal team using Soviet laws to try to free Sharansky (which is one of the many reasons why I recently exercised one of my few powers as an academic to nominate Cotler for a Nobel Peace Prize). Tens of thousands of others were in the supporting cast – wearing bracelets, writing letters, attending rallies, donating money, visiting refuseniks, lobbying politicians, exercising their democratic rights to fight for those whose rights were being violated.

Today, Sharansky is one of the Jewish world's few iconic figures, probably the leading Zionist pop star. At a moment in history when Israel is being delegitimized, when too many potential Zionists wallow in cynicism or despair, he represents the Zionist dream, the possibility of personal and collective redemption through Jewish nationalism and by building a thriving, democratic state of Israel. As chairman of the Jewish Agency, he is spearheading a critical reframing of the agency's mission – and the Jewish People's essential task – understanding that in the 21st century, we must be in the business of saving souls and instilling values, not just saving lives. Our challenges are about who we are, what kind of lives we shall lead and how can we use Judaism, Zionism and Israel as frameworks for finding meaning and making a difference in the world.

More broadly, Sharansky teaches that democracy entails more than occasional trips to the voting booth, that it requires basic civil rights and freedoms. In his book, The Case for Democracy, he defines a country as being free if any citizen can denounce the government in the town square without suffering consequences. And yet, while the Sharansky Test suggests we should not naively think that every popular rebellion against a dictator is necessarily democratic, Sharansky has been very excited by the possibility of reform in the Arab world. He believes in democracy's healing power and the mass desire for democracy.

Natan Sharansky

I confess: when I was young, I had his name etched into a bracelet I wore, and his cause – freedom for all Soviet Jews, and all Soviet citizens – imprinted on my heart. I doubted we would succeed. I thought of the quest to free him as an impossible dream, worth pursuing, but unlikely. Sharansky shows that impossible dreams can come true. His life story is about making not only the impossible possible, but the improbable likely.

Sharansky shows that history is not just about tragedy but success, not just about despair but about hope, not just about wars and dictators but ideas – and short little bald guys who can stand up against evil and change the world.

A sweet singer in Israel

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

I grew up in a Reform synagogue that didn't sing. My cantor had a deep bass voice, and he proclaimed the prayers rather than chanting them. We never sang along, except for the Shema, which he intoned slowly and importantly, as if allowing the congregation to join in. Though I loved his sonorous tones and the solemnity of the service, I wondered what it would feel like if we all participated more. From my friends, I learned that my experience was typical. None of them ever sang in shul.

But everything changed when I went to Jewish summer camp and youth group. There I met a young song-leader named Debbie Friedman, who was already shaking up the establishment with her creative renderings of familiar synagogue prayers and her new compositions of prayers in English. Suddenly we were all clapping and dancing and bouncing and joining hands in a circle to a rousing chorus of Psalms. Suddenly we were singing things we had heard before in shul, such as Mi Chamocha or Aleynu, and singing with fervour. We closed our eyes and melodiously harmonized with beautiful new tunes that praised the matriarchs and glorified creation, nature and the Divine in the world.

Here were Reform Jewish kids proclaiming "How glorious Thy Name in all the earth!" and feeling the meaning behind every word. Here were Reform Jewish teenagers looking forward to weekday-evening services and inspired by worship. We wanted to sing Debbie's songs. We wanted to learn to song-lead like Debbie. We wanted our deep-voiced cantors to pick up a guitar and lead us in "singing a new song unto God." We wanted to feel the joy of Debbie's music all year long.

So we took her music back from camp and back from NFTY events to our cantors and rabbis and synagogues. There was resistance. Her music was too folksy they said, too sing-songy, not serious enough. Instead we led "teen services" (who could argue with a group of 17- and 18-year-olds who wanted to lead services once in a while?) and taught the congregation some of her tunes. They caught on fast and furious.

Pretty soon a song here and a song there would be incorporated into the "main" service. Now, so long after those years have gone by, we can't imagine a Reform service without her Mi Sheberach or a Havdalah that doesn't use her tune. Her music is sung worldwide, in Conservative and Reconstructionist and even Orthodox camps and shuls; in non-denominational Jewish settings; at weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs; in shiva homes, and even in churches. Countless number of new Jewish folk artists have been inspired by her and continue to create a new Jewish folk music scene because she opened that door. Debbie changed the Jewish world forever.

This was all before she became ill in the 1990s with a chronic neurological condition that was never definitively diagnosed, but that weakened and debilitated her. Debbie lived and performed with the illness, and it moved her music into a new Jewish music genre that she helped to establish: Jewish "healing" music. She faced the challenges of her illness by forging this new kind of Jewish folk music, which allowed for spiritual growth through the most intense of challenges. Debbie herself wrote, "It is a strange thing that pain creates beauty and potential for healing… The willingness to both offer and receive blessings of healing and well-being allows one who is wounded to transform and unravel their pain… We are not just the recipients of blessings, but the messengers of blessings as well. Remember, out of what emerges from life's painful challenges will come our healing."

Debbie passed away tragically last month after falling ill with pneumonia at the Jewish learning conference Limmud England at the end of December. Thousands of people around the world sang her Mi Sheberach for her, in congregations and community centres everywhere, during her last days in the hospital. I pray she felt that energy and that love as it lifted her heaven-ward.

Debbie touched many lives. She certainly touched mine, and my introduction to her music years ago is one of the reasons I am a rabbi today. I am proud that the Reform community memorialized her on Feb. 23, the day she would have turned 60. A sweet singer in Israel is gone. May her memory be a blessing.

Egypt's wild card – the Muslim Brotherhood

Hosni Mubarak's abrupt departure from the scene, prompted by an upheaval of historic proportions, sets the stage for a new phase in modern Egyptian history. The 18-day popular uprising that led to his ouster on Feb. 11 as Egypt's authoritarian president may yet usher in an epoch of democracy.

Mubarak's powers were assumed by the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces, chaired by Field Marshal Mohammed Hussein Tantawi, the minister of defence and a veteran of the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War. Tantawi proceeded to dissolve parliament, suspend the constitution and announce that elections would be held within about six months.

These developments may be to the advantage of the still-banned Muslim Brotherhood, Egypt's largest and best organized opposition group and the world's oldest Islamist movement.

In an op-ed piece in the New York Times on Feb. 10, Essam El-Errian, a member of its governing council, claimed that the Muslim Brotherhood has no intention of playing what he called "a dominant role" in Egypt's gradual transition to democracy: "We are not putting forward a candidate for the presidential elections."

Nonetheless, the Muslim Brotherhood, which compares itself to Turkey's Justice and Development party, may wield influence in the future and play a role in shaping Egyptian society and Egypt's policy toward Israel.

The Islamist movement has already emerged from the shadows. On the eve of Mubarak's resignation, Egypt's vice-president, Omar Suleiman, invited all the opposition groups, including the Muslim Brotherhood, to a "dialogue" on government reform. For the first time since the fall of the monarchy in 1952, the military-backed regime agreed to discuss what had been taboo topics: free and fair elections, freedom of expression and the repeal of the state of emergency, which Mubarak imposed after his predecessor, Anwar Sadat, was assassinated.

That the Muslim Brotherhood was invited to these talks was of enormous importance. "Today, we were recognized," said its secretary-general, Mahmoud Hussein.

Quite so.

Significantly, the United States tentatively welcomed the Muslim Brotherhood's participation in these roundtable discussions.

Iran, for self-serving reasons, portrayed the Egyptian revolution as a triumph of support for a hardline Islamic government.

But judging by comments by Mohammed Akif, its previous leader, the Muslim Brotherhood

seeks a republican system of government that is "democratic, constitutional and parliamentary and conforms with Islamic principles."

In his newspaper piece, El-Errian wrote that the Muslim Brotherhood is committed to "an agenda of gradual reform." But he added that American or European-style "secular democracy, with its firm rejection of religion in public life, is not the exclusive model for a legitimate democracy."

His observations beg a question: is the Muslim Brotherhood secretly working for a theocratic regime?

Established in 1928 as a discussion group and charitable organization, it was founded by Hassan al-Banna, who preached that Egypt had descended into poverty, corruption and division after straying from the moral and spiritual principles of Islam.

Proclaiming that "Islam is the solution," he argued that Egypt could only rebuild its power and pride by adopting Islamic law.

Al-Banna also called for social justice and equality, the unification of Egypt with the Islamic world – a new caliphate – and Egypt's liberation from British colonial rule.

On a concrete level, the Muslim Brotherhood attempted to ingratiate itself with the Egyptian masses by creating a network of professional associations, clinics, schools, libraries and mosques.

Its attitude to violence varied. One faction promoted armed confrontation with the government, but the moderate wing believed that the way to power was through education. The debate was heightened by Al-Banna's assassination in 1949.

By all accounts, he was killed by the secret police to avenge the murder of Egypt's prime minister, whose death was blamed on the Muslim Brotherhood. Eventually, it embraced a policy of non-violence.

According to Bruce Rutherford, the author of Egypt after Mubarak: Liberalism, Islam and Democracy in the Arab World, the army officers who staged the 1952 coup regarded the Muslim Brotherhood as allies. Both advocated a clean and transparent parliamentary form of government, economic reforms to narrow the gap between rich and poor and the end of Britain's occupation.

Since their platforms were similar, Egypt's new and charismatic strongman,

Mohammed Badie

The honeymoon did not last long. In 1954, after the Muslim Brotherhood was accused of trying to assassinate Nasser, more than 30,000 Muslim Brothers were arrested and several of its leaders were executed. Being exceedingly resilient, the Muslim Brotherhood weathered this crisis.

During the 1960s, the Muslim Brotherhood faced one more moment of truth when one of its most influential thinkers, Sayyid Qutb, called for the overthrow of the Egyptian government on the grounds that its policies were inimical to Islam.

In 1965, Nasser arrested 18,000 Muslim Brothers and then executed 26 of its leaders, including Qutb, whose radical ideas have influenced a generation of Islamic extremists from Al Qaeda's Osama bin Laden to the leadership of Hamas and Hezbollah.

With Egypt's defeat in the Six Day War, the Muslim Brotherhood regrouped as Nasser released thousands of its imprisoned members. Nasser's unlikely successor, Sadat, used the Muslim Brotherhood as a counterweight to leftist and Nasserist influence. Ironically, Sadat was assassinated by a Muslim Brotherhood splinter group. Like Sadat, Mubarak attempted to co-opt the Muslim Brotherhood, which is primarily supported by the lower middle class. Although Mubarak did not permit the Muslim Brotherhood to form a political party, he let it contest faux elections as independents from 1984 onward.

In 2005, the Muslim Brotherhood won 88 parliamentary seats, or 20 per cent of the total. In last year's election, the Muslim Brotherhood was completely shut out, causing its current leader, or general guide, Mohammed Badie, to cry foul.

Despite its apparent acceptance of democratic norms and its rejection of violence, the Muslim Brotherhood has historically been vehemently anti-Israel.

Muslim Brotherhood volunteers fought in the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. More recently, the Muslim Brotherhood urged Egypt to expel Israel's ambassador, suspend diplomatic relations with Israel and abrogate the 1979 peace treaty.

Last May, three of its members were aboard a Turkish ship attempting to break Israel's blockade of Gaza. Earlier this month, one of its spokesmen told an Iranian Arabic-language satellite TV station that Egyptians "should be prepared for war against Israel."

Clearly, the Muslim Brotherhood will be a wild card in Egypt's transition to democracy.

Another steady and happy year for my family.

I invested with Romspen on the advice of a friend 18 years ago. Throughout I have consistently added to my Romspen account. At one point I took some investment dollars out to put into mutual funds, but I was sorry. It didn't compare to the consistent returns and peace of mind that the Romspen fund gives me. Everyone in my family is a Romspen investor. We like the personal service we get any time we call. I feel fortunate that we are physically, spiritually and financially healthy.

Shabbat: gift and governance

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl
Special to The CJN

More than two decades ago, the Wall Street Journal ran an article about the way some New York financial workers and lawyers protect themselves from the brutal schedules and pressures they face: they become Sabbath observers. Not in the ritual sense, but with an awareness of the Jewish tradition. Some attend shul. Others play tennis. But they make it clear that they don't engage in commercial activity on Shabbat.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

More people are again thinking about Shabbat. Reboot, a secular effort to "re-vision" Judaism, is asking "hyper-connected people of all backgrounds" to unplug their phones, computers and other technology for 24 hours – from sundown on Friday, March 4 to sundown on Saturday, March 5, its second annual National Day of Unplugging.

Shabbat is both a responsibility and an opportunity. We are commanded to cease the activities that usually define our lives and shape the world.

The Torah links Shabbat to two core events – the birth of the cosmos and the formation of the Nation of Israel.

On a universal level, Shabbat is a reminder of the cessation of creative activity by God. It is connected to the environmental ideal of allowing the world to be, enabling us to take the time to turn off the switch, walk, learn and relax.

On a national level, Shabbat recalls the liberation of our ancestors from Egypt, the freedom to control our own lives, and the opportunity to spend time with God.

Delia Lloyd, a writer based in London, England, blogs for the Huffington Post. She writes about her Shabbat experiment:

"A month ago, I committed myself to testing out a new personal resolution: I would no longer work on Saturdays… It encompassed anything electronic (e.g. e-mail, Facebook, Twitter, RSS feeds) as well as conducting interviews and, of course, writing. My attempt to celebrate a secular sabbath was… not only doable, it also gave me a huge happiness boost… There was not a Saturday that I wasn't tempted to do at least a bit of work. But there also wasn't a Saturday that I wasn't glad that I had decided not to. So here are five things I gained from taking Saturdays off:

• I relaxed. My main goal in taking Saturdays off was to bring a few of my favourite things… back into my life: specifically, reading the New Yorker and going to yoga… And now it's part of my (new and improved!) Saturday routine.

• I was more focused with my children… In the last month or so, I've actually sat down and focused on my kids for hours at a clip… One day, my son and I actually took out the chemistry set that he'd gotten for Chanukah… and – gasp – actually used it. And the more I focused on the kids and didn't try to get 12 other things done simultaneously, the more relaxed I was with them.

• I re-connected… I used to call friends during my daily 45-minute commute home… [But overseas and] over time, I [called] my friends less and less… Now that I've given myself leave not to use spare time on Saturdays to jump on the computer, I can usually find 30 minutes… to call a friend back in America.

• I went shopping… I am not a natural shopper… I will always opt to get some work done… In the past month, I've purchased some running shoes, a new jacket, some earrings, even a colourful scarf to brighten up this dreary London winter.

• I'm more productive… I think about Saturdays as "my time" – a chance to recharge… When I sit down on Sunday morning to tackle that cluttered in-box, I actually have more energy." (Sabbath Saturday: 5 Things I Gained By Not Working On Saturdays, Feb. 2, 2010)

From a traditional Jewish perspective, shopping or doing chemistry projects with a child are not within the framework of Shabbat-permitted activities, but Delia Lloyd may be on to something.

Writing in the Wall Street Journal, Mollie Ziegler Hemingway reviewed two books by non-Jews pointing to the neglect of the Sabbath in our culture and the corrosive impact of such neglect on human life.

"Of all the gifts Jews gave the world, that of a weekly day of rest is certainly one to be cherished. And yet the Sabbath is now marked more by its neglect than its keeping…

"The flip side to the prosperity we enjoy is that we have lost our day of rest for another day of consumption. The pace of commerce and technology provide unheard of options for ignoring family, religion and rest – not just on the Sabbath but every day of the week." (The Decline of the Sabbath: Less praying, more working and playing, Mollie Ziegler Hemingway, Wall Street Journal, June 15, 2007)

Shabbat is a blessing that involves an obligation and a responsibility. In traditional Judaism, Shabbat is understood as having two aspects: (1) zachor – remember – a gift and opportunity to grow our souls and our family life; and (2) shamor – observe – a limitation on our activities to create the space needed to develop the first. Think of breathing – in order to inhale fresh air, we must exhale to make space in our lungs for the new breath.

When the people of Israel are instructed to build a wilderness Sanctuary for worship, they are twice told of the importance of the project and twice reminded to – as important as this construction job is – stop working to observe the Shabbat. The activities prohibited on Shabbat are related to 39 types of activity involved in the construction of that wilderness Sanctuary.

Historically, Shabbat was a day when we stepped away from the cruel world and spent time with God. Our world now is not so punishing – at least for us in North America – but it is still demanding. People who have any executive or professional role feel as though they are on call 24/7. The demands of the BlackBerry, smart phones and e-mails never seem to cease.

Last year, Judith Shulevitz published The Sabbath World: Glimpses of a Different Order of Time, based on an essay that originally appeared in the New York Times Magazine. In her article, Shulevitz tells her readers:

"Workaholism… has become the norm, and the Sabbath… has become the holiday Americans are most likely never to take.

"Most people mistakenly believe that all you have to do to stop working is not work. The inventors of the Sabbath understood that it was a much more complicated undertaking.

"Religious rituals do not exist simply to promote togetherness. They… convey a certain story about who we are without our even quite noticing that they are doing so… We rest in order to honour the divine in us, to remind ourselves that there is more to us than just what we do during the week…

"The Sabbath provides two things essential to anyone who wishes to lift himself out of the banality of mercantile culture: time to contemplate and distance from everyday demands…

"I began to incorporate into my life the most elemental rudiments of a traditional Jewish Sabbath… Orthodox Jews will scoff when they read of my sub-minimal level of observance; my secular friends think I've become a fanatic. Sticking to these few rituals, however, is the hardest and least unconscious thing I've ever done…

"Do I think everyone else should observe a Sabbath? I believe it would be good for them, and even better for me, since the more widespread the ritual, the more likely I am to observe it. It is much easier to keep the Sabbath, for instance, when your family does… If the Sabbath you choose to observe isn't a religious one, you should nonetheless be religiously disciplined in your approach to it, observing it every week, not just when it's convenient… We have to remember to stop because we have to stop to remember." (Bring Back the Sabbath, New York Times Magazine, Judith Shulevitz, March 2, 2003)

Perhaps the time has come to try once again to receive the gift of Shabbat along with some of its governing rules. Achad Ha'am once famously remarked, "More than the Jews preserved Shabbat, Shabbat preserved the Jews." Now the scale is global, universal and very personal. We all need Shabbat. It keeps us human.

Local Israelis urged to speak Hebrew at home

Hamifgash program focuses on identity in North America

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Israeli families living in Canada are exposed to many foreign cultural elements. Preserving the Israeli identity and the Hebrew language, in particular among the young generation, is a great challenge for them.

That was the theme of the second Hamifgash Program dealing with the Israeli identity in North America, held Feb. 13 at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill campus.

Israeli educator Nesya Richter spoke about ways to preserve the Hebrew language and strategies to convey the importance of preserving the Hebrew language among the younger generation.

Richter develops Hebrew curricula for several schools, including the Hamilton Hebrew High Midrasha program in Ontario. She instructs Hebrew-language teachers and is completing her PhD at Bar-Ilan University in Israel.

Her thesis is titled The Impact of Jewish Education on Hebrew Language Maintenance among Bilingual Children in Canada.

Richter's lecture at the Hamifgash Program was based on current research and findings from previous research on the interaction of Hebrew and English among bilingual children in Canada.

Richter's main message was to parents. She recommended that they have a positive attitude, patience and deep understanding that the Hebrew language is part of who and what Israelis are.

"If we want to keep our identity and culture in the far future, then the Hebrew language has a major role in that identity," she said. "Everyone in the family benefits from bilingualism – the children and the parents – as long as they use Hebrew as their most proficient language to share their knowledge and life experiences."

She said the "best way to preserve the Hebrew language among young children is to speak Hebrew at home. Both parents should be dedicated to that important task. Children should also hear their mother language from others, and they should be proud of their language and culture."

According to Richter, many parents are confused about the language issue. Some think that speaking English at home from the beginning is the best way for their child to become part of the local culture. Other parents don't want to put their children in a difficult situation in which they bring their children to a new culture and at the same time preserve the old one via the Hebrew language.

"Research has shown that children who are exposed to a new language that is different from their first language will speak it conversationally after 18 to 24 months," she said.

"In order to be fluent in both languages the amount of exposure to each language is important. The main thing that parents have to do is to speak only in Hebrew at home and to make sure that their children respond to them in Hebrew.

"It is a demanding task that requires responsibility and persistence. It is frustrating and sometimes you want to give up, but eventually it's worth it," Richter continued. "Bilingualism has many advantages, including improved cognitive development."

Richter said that "besides speaking Hebrew at home, in order to enrich children's vocabulary and culture, they must be exposed to other elements of the language. They should read books, listen to texts and music, watch movies, and talk [in Hebrew] to friends and family members in their homeland.

"If this does not happen, then children will have limited communication and understanding capabilities, and they may abandon the Hebrew language and choose English as their preferred language."

Language, she said, "is a means of communication, a part of a culture and a part of one's national identity. Language makes each one of us part of a group, and above all, our mother language is a way to acquire norms and cultural values that stay with us for life."

Annex shul gets new spiritual leader

Hopes to offer 'custom-made Jewish experience'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Annex Shul's new spiritual leader, Yacov Fruchter, said he hopes to offer his congregants a "custom-made Jewish experience."

"Tons of young Jewish people are looking for new experiences. They are looking to connect more Jewishly, and we need to find the right language and the right way to connect with them," said 28-year-old Fruchter, who recently left his post as United Israel Appeal's director of emerging campuses for Hillel Canada to pursue his passion with the Annex Shul.

Inspired by Montreal's Ghetto Shul – a grassroots synagogue in the McGill Ghetto neighbourhood heavily populated by students and young professionals – the Annex Shul was founded in 2006 by Bram Belzberg and his friend, Richard Meloff.

The idea was to provide Toronto's young Jewish community with an intimate, inclusive space to connect with their Jewish roots on their own terms.

Some 4-1/2 years later, the shul attracts hundreds of young Jews to its Carlebach-style services, holiday parties, Shabbatons and lectures.

"We're trying to create a space that is really beyond denominations and beyond people's backgrounds. We want it to be accessible to everyone," Fruchter said.

He added that his title as a spiritual leader rather than a rabbi "is a luxury... because it means that we're not tied down to any one denomination. We consider ourselves a non-denominational shul where our focus is to give people the opportunity to own their own Jewish experience.

The Annex Shul's new spiritual leader, Yacov Fruchter, hopes he can reinvent the inclusive, non-denominational synagogue. [Jon Cohen photo]

"One thing that's unique about the Annex Shul is that... we're not trying to get people to go from a specific point A to point B in terms of Jewish growth. We're obviously trying to take them to a point B, but we're not telling them what point B is."

He said he enjoys the fact that Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Jews feel comfortable to come together at the Annex Shul to eat, pray and celebrate.

"I think that is pretty rare in this city."

Earlier this month, the shul, which runs out of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, threw a weekend-long event titled the Milestone Weekend to celebrate Fruchter's new role and a successful membership drive that led to about 70 people officially joining the congregation.

"We wanted to honour our founding members and to let whoever wants to know about us in the community to have an opportunity to come see what it is what we're doing," Fruchter said.

Refusing to rest on the shul's laurels, Fruchter, who has worked part-time for the congregation since 2009 leading services and classes, said he hopes to take the Annex Shul to "a higher level.

"We're trying to reinvent the organization both as a shul and as a community of young professionals. It requires lots of conversations with our community, lots of planning sessions, but also lots of time to teach meaningful classes," he said.

Fruchter said that while the Annex shul still largely represents single Jews and newly married couples, he wants to better accommodate young families who are looking for a community that will provide fun, meaningful and entertaining programming for their young kids.

"Recently, we've been having Shabbat services and dinners once a month that are specifically geared toward young families," Fruchter said.

"The parents are loving it, because it's Friday night and the kids are singing and dancing around... and the parents get to have a shot of scotch while they're playing with their kids on a Friday night in a community setting."

The shul's tagline, "Come as you are, make it yours," resonates with Fruchter, but it took him a long time to be able to fully embrace that philosophy.

He said that as a child growing up in Montreal, he was very involved in the Jewish community.

"From the age of nine, I was reading from the Torah and leading different parts of the service, and later in my life I ran a shul in an old age home in Montreal for about three years... I went to a Jewish day school my whole life, and I also spent time in Israel learning in a yeshiva," he said.

"I grew up in a modern Orthodox home, and it was warm and loving, but there was a switch that I needed to go through to get to the point where I realized that the structures that we've placed in our community can divide us. We have to be able to see beyond them."

Fruchter hopes that his influence as the shul's spiritual leader will help others see beyond the differences within the denominations.

"We can be a role model for what the Jewish community can look like, being able to reach out beyond the lines that separate us and to create a warm space in this community," he said.

"There is a lot of warmth in the Toronto Jewish community, and we're happy to be a part of that."

Hike offers unique way to experience Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

On most organized trips to Israel, you'll probably see the standard sights, but on the One Family Fund Cross Israel Hike you'll connect with the land and the people of Israel in a way you've never done before – by hiking through the country's spectacular natural environment in the company of victims of terror who've received support from One Family Fund.

Since 2008, participants on the One Family Fund Cross-Israel Hike have trekked through different sections of the Israel National Trail, a 940-kilometre path that extends from the Lebanese border all the way to the Red Sea, traversing Israel's unique physical and historical landscape.

This year's hike, which takes place in the picturesque Ein Gedi region from Oct. 29 to Nov. 3, gives participants the opportunity to personally help victims of terror rebuild their lives while hiking through the spectacular Judean Hills of the Dead Sea region.

The group will depart from Tel Aviv after Shabbat ends on Saturday, Oct. 29, travel by bus to Ein Gedi, and hike from Sunday, Oct. 30 to Thursday, Nov. 3, in small groups. All hikers are escorted by experienced guides and medics while being immersed in the scenery of the Judean Hills in the Dead Sea region.

Individuals who have been affected by terrorism and have received support from One Family Fund accompany the hikers throughout the five days and nights of the hike, creating memorable bonds and meaningful connections.

The funds that it raises provide financial, legal and emotional support and include psychological counselling, support groups and retreats, summer camps for children, and other types of assistance such as job retraining, in order to help entire family units get back to pre-attack levels of functioning.

Prospective participants can learn more about the hike at an upcoming information session at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, March 1 at Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

For more information or to reserve a spot, please contact hike@onefamilyfund.ca or call 416-489-9687.

Stones and memories

Memorial honours passengers of MS St. Louis

Bernie Farber

"Are you a Jew?" asked one of the guards.
"Yes," answered the child at the barrier.
"Jews are not admitted," snapped the guard.
"Oh, please let me in. I'm only a very little Jew."

This was the game played by children aboard the MS St. Louis, the ship that sailed on May 27, 1939, with 937 Jews from Germany on board, heading for Cuba. All had valid Cuban visas, and hoped to be saved from Hitler's coming madness.

On Jan. 20, I had the honour, along with Canadian Jewish Congress national president, Mark Freiman, to represent Canadian Jewry at the unveiling of a singularly unique memorial honouring the ill-fated passengers of that Voyage of the Damned.

It was for me the culmination of a long-held vision – to help Canadians understand the horror of bigoted intolerance and its ultimate end point. Working with my colleague Eric Vernon, we hoped to offer the tragedy of the MS St. Louis as a metaphor for the Shoah itself. Here on one boat heading toward a new life of freedom were Jewish refugees – but they could have been any of us – mothers and fathers, children and young lovers, the microcosm of Jewry fleeing danger and hoping for redemption.

At that moment, when the storm clouds of Hitler's hate were heavy but the deluge had not yet begun, the leaders of this country and others had an opportunity to create a spark of light and so diminish, if only for a brief space, the darkness that was gathering.

It was not to be.

Cuba refused them entry, as did the United States.

The New York Times wrote: "Off our shores she [the St. Louis] was attended by a helpful Coast Guard vessel alert to pick up any passengers who plunged overboard and thrust them back... The refugees could even see the shimmering towers of Miami... the battlements of another forbidden city."

Gustav Schroeder, captain of the St. Louis, was a man of great humanity. Despite his loyalty to the Nazi state, his sense of responsibility led him to determine that these refugees should not be abandoned.

Desperate, he headed for the shores of Canada. The St. Louis found itself outside Canadian territorial waters but within a journey of a day or so to Halifax Harbour's Pier 21.

Tragically, the luckless Jewish passengers encountered the antisemitism that was to become the refrain of the Canadian government when it came to the question of Jewish refugees. None is too many said a nameless government official. It might as well have been a government fiat. Prime minister Mackenzie King turned a deaf ear to pleas from my predecessors at CJC and refused to consider any offer of sanctuary.

Bernie Farber at the monument to the village and province where his father came from in Poland. Of the more than 20,000 Jews that once lived in the area, more than 90 percent were murdered in Treblinka.

Eventually, after weeks at sea, rampant sickness, despair and disillusionment overtook most of the passengers. A second editorial in the New York Times lamented, "We can only hope that some hearts will soften somewhere and some refuge be found. The cruise of the St. Louis cries to heaven of man's inhumanity to men."

Capt. Schroeder remained resolute and, with the assistance of the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, negotiations with Britain, Belgium, Holland and France led to each of these countries accepting a total of 900 passengers (29 had managed to get into Cuba). But the reprieve was short-lived: the Jewish passengers granted temporary asylum in mainland Europe were caught in the Nazi blitzkrieg. More than one-third of them perished under the Nazis.

Canada – Jew and non-Jew alike – failed our brothers and sisters in 1939. Our remembrance of that failure is both a Kaddish and an act of tshuvah.

We must remember not only those who travelled on the St. Louis, but also those who travelled by foot and wagon on hidden roads to the edge of the killing pits, and those who travelled by cattle car to the killing centres that dotted the map of the kingdom of death. We must speak for those whose voices were lost and for those thousands of survivors who came to Canada after the war, wore their agony as undergarments beneath their everyday attire and helped build this country. In Auschwitz, "Canada" was a place where life could be maintained. Our survivors made that fantasy a reality.

I am also here for my father, Max, a survivor of the Shoah. Max, while returning to his small Polish village after searching for food for his family, was caught in a Nazi "aktion" and herded on to a cattle car whose ultimate destination was the Treblinka death camp. Miraculously, he managed to kick through the slats of the cattle car and jump off the moving train. He made his way home only to discover that his entire family had been taken on that train to death. It was at Treblinka that my father lost his first family, and I lost half brothers I never knew.

Guest Voice

Have you been to Treblinka? I have. It was soul-destroying. It was a blustery cold February in 2006. I am not really sure what I expected. I had been to Auschwitz and Majdanek – both death camps turned into museums that today are testaments to man's capability for evil. However as museums they seemed almost pristine in their presentation of horror. At Treblinka, the Nazis attempted to destroy any last vestiges of their horrendous crime. There are no barracks, no railway ties, and no remnants of electrified fences. Indeed Treblinka itself is difficult to find. I am told this was the way the Nazis wanted it because unlike the other camps that had originally been built as labour camps, Treblinka had only one function, to murder the Jews of eastern Poland.

There is nothing there today but the monuments erected by the generations that followed the war. Treblinka is empty. It is oblivion. It is the void to which the Nazis sought to consign the Jewish people. But there is a monument in Treblinka. It means that the bodies could be destroyed but our memory of them could not. The monument we unveiled on Jan. 20 in Halifax had that same meaning: that we understand how we failed our brothers and sisters, but that we will not do so again.

I came to Pier 21 as well for my mother Gertrude, who, 12 years before the St. Louis, disembarked from the ship Alaunia, ironically in Halifax at Pier 21, after a harried flight with my grandmother from Ukraine, where Jewish persecution and pogroms were commonplace.

How jubilant she must have felt taking her first tentative steps onto Canadian soil, dreaming of what could be possible for a 13-year-old Jewish girl in Canada, the land of her dreams. Sadly, the gates for Jewish refugees were soon to slam shut, leaving behind thousands who should have had the opportunity to share that dream.

By the grace of a thousand miracles the dreams of my parents, Max and Gertrude, both refugees, became my goals in life. Their histories became my future inspiration. Their tragedies and triumphs became my vehicle for understanding tolerance, human dignity and the need to treat everyone as we ourselves would want to be treated.

My parents taught me that memory is our best hope for the future. And it was memory that in fact drove me toward the day we unveiled Daniel Liebskind's "Wheel of Conscience" at Pier 21.

On that day, as I sat listening to the dignitaries speak, I returned to the last few minutes of my time at Treblinka. I remembered clearing the snow from a small bench. As I sat, a small ray of sunshine broke through the grey sky, as if God Himself was taking a quick peek at this tardy explorer who had waited so hard to be here. Tears ran down my frozen cheeks. I looked up to see the monument erected in the middle of what was once the camp. It was in the shape of a piece of Judaism's most holy of symbols, Jerusalem's Western Wall. Eerily, surrounding it as far as the eye can see were jagged stones each inscribed with the name of a lost Polish Jewish community pointing a dagger-like accusing finger heavenward. I rose slowly, walking toward the stone that memorialized my father's village, and as the ray of sun slowly receded back into the grey sky, I said Kaddish. I placed a small pebble upon the gravestone as a witness to the memory of my father's village.

As the ceremony came to a close in Halifax, a sense of pride overtook me. I realized that while we failed our people 72 years ago, today we stand on the shoulders of those who suffered the indignities of the kingdom of death; today we speak for those whose voices have been forever stilled; today that little stone I placed at Treblinka will forever be the "Wheel of Conscience" at the Halifax Harbour.

TanenbaumCHAT celebrates 50 years

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) has come a long way since Judith Weinroth attended what was then known as the Toronto Hebrew High School. The Toronto physician was a member of its small first graduating class in 1965.

"We really were the pioneers," she recalls.

TanenbaumCHAT now has a total of 1,450 students at two campuses and is celebrating its 50th anniversary this year with a series of events.

On March 6, there will be a Birthday Bash Gala at On The Park, the site of the former Inn on the Park hotel. Attire – '60s chic – is a nod to the school's beginnings.

The $180-a-plate dinner, which will feature a commemorative video, is a fundraiser for a school fund that subsidizes school activities and the purchase of equipment.

A planned $8-million expansion and refurbishment of the school's Wilmington Ave. campus, including five new science labs, will be funded through TanenbaumCHAT's capital fund. Fundraising for the project will begin after the gala.

The expansion is expected to be completed in 2013, said Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education.

Since Shaviv joined the school 12 years ago, it has doubled in size, adding a second campus in Richmond Hill.

As well, Shaviv noted, extracurricular activities have expanded, and there is now a full music program at both campuses in "purpose-built, fully equipped music centres."

He added that the school has become a more "user-friendly place to a wider range of students and denominations of the community," and that it continues to have the best university entrance record of any school in Ontario.

As well, he said, "It's the largest private high school in Canada, even though we recruit from a relatively small community."

The school's emphasis on academics dates back to its beginning, when it started as an outgrowth of Associated Hebrew Schools and was housed on Neptune Drive. It became independent early in its history.

For the school's first students, there was pressure to succeed, said Weinroth. "If we didn't do well, I think the school probably wouldn't have existed any more."

Jewish studies courses did not count for credit at the time, and students' standings were based entirely on provincial departmental exams. Although facilities such as science labs were "primitive," Weinroth said she had "a great experience" at the school, with wonderful teachers and strong friendships that have lasted ever since.

She credits the school and its double curriculum for helping her "learn how to be organized and work hard." Those skills served her well as a medical student, when she was in her 30s with four young children. Three of them are also graduates of the school.

Shaviv said that the jubilee year is "a time for us to take quiet pride in the achievements of 50 years, and to spend a lot of energy looking forward to what we have to do to make sure our coming 50 years are as momentous."

School president Cecile Zaifman, the mother of a Grade 10 TanenbaumCHAT student and two graduates of the school, said it has educated thousands of students and prepared them to be leaders of the community.

She added that about 400 people are expected to attend the gala. "We're very excited. We think it's a great thing to celebrate, and we look forward to our next 50 years."

Other jubilee year events include a homecoming weekend held last fall, and an upcoming event this fall with guest speaker Rabbi Donniel Hartman. The president of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem will talk about the future of Judaism.

104-year-old still prepares family's meals

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Mark Biel, who lives with his grandmother, Bassia Guterman, lovingly complains that she's making him fat.

It's not an unusual complaint, except that Guterman recently celebrated her 104th birthday.

Biel said that his grandmother prepares seven meals a week for the two of them and often for company, and she bakes such goodies as sour cream buns, cinnamon walnut cake and banana cake.

In an interview in her Downsview home, Guterman describes a new recipe that she developed because she wanted to use up ingredients she had in the house.

"I put skinless, boneless chicken breasts in a baking dish, and added dried cranberries and peeled, diced apples. I then baked it until the chicken was ready. It was delicious."

The recipes are all in her head, she said. "I make them so often, I don't need them written down. Sometimes I worry I that I didn't add enough sugar, but they're always fine."

Born in Harbin, China, in 1907, she has one daughter, Dolly Biel – Mark's mother – one other granddaughter, and four great-grandchildren. Her husband Alexander, who she met and married in China, died in 1970. They immigrated to Canada in 1952.

Guterman's grandfather had arrived in China from Russia in 1898 because he supplied ties for the Trans-Siberian Railway. He prospered, there, and eventually built the Grand Hotel, where Guterman lived when she was born.

She didn't cook in China, she said, but learned a lot from watching her chef, who prepared European food.

"I had to learn here, but when I started, the memories came back to me. I remember that he had to stick his arm in the oven to see if it was hot enough. Even if it was 100 degrees outside, he'd cook in that coal stove."

She hasn't returned to China – her daughter went in 2004 – "because I want to remember it like it was."

Dolly Biel said that her mother has always been a "home person. She was happy to be with her family. She is very artistic, and until recently did needlework, embroidery and applique. Whatever she decided to do, she would do an excellent job."

Biel, who is writing a book about her family, said she calls her mother when she needs a detail filled in. "She thinks and feels young. She wears a hearing aid, but she walks unaided – no cane or walking stick."

Guterman celebrated her birthday with 12 people at a Chinese restaurant, "and the next table cheered for me."

What is it like to be 104? "I didn't really realize it until I looked in the mirror. I don't feel any different than I did 60 years ago."

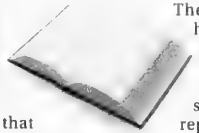
Rabbinic Reflections



In this week's Torah portion of Vayakhel, we are told of an unusual problem, one I think more people wish they had!

We read that Moses called on Bezalel and Oholiab, and every skilled person whom the Lord had endowed with skill to undertake the task of building and preparing the Mishkan, the portable Tabernacle or Sanctuary the Israelites used in the desert. They also took from Moses all the gifts that the Israelites had brought, to carry out the tasks connected with the service of the Sanctuary.

But when people continued to bring freewill offerings to Moses morning after morning, the artisans who were engaged in the tasks related to the Sanctuary came, each from the task upon which he was engaged, and said to Moses, "The people are bringing more than is needed for the tasks entailed in the work that the Lord has commanded to be done."

Moses thereupon had this proclamation made throughout the camp: "Let no man or woman make further effort toward gifts for the Sanctuary!" So the people stopped bringing: their efforts had been more than enough.

I'm sure that few who have ever asked for a donation have had the experience Moses did when building the Mishkan. It's usually a struggle asking people to give of their financial resources to a cause, regardless of how worthy it might be.

What was Moses' secret for receiving such an overwhelming response?

Moses had an advantage. It wasn't the marketing agency he had hired or the ad campaign he initiated. It was the fact that participating in the building of the Mishkan touched everyone's heart and soul. They were being asked for a contribution not merely to a tangible object (a hospital, symphony, school, etc.), but to an idea that was beyond the moment.

The Israelites understood they were giving of their possessions to support not just a building but more – a link to the Divine. By contributing to the Mishkan, they were connecting to an ideal that was eternal. Through their limited means, they knew their gifts would strengthen their relationship with God and lift them from their limited sense of place to a time beyond their years on this earth.

We know that we are finite beings. As the Psalmist reminds us: "Man's days are like grass; he blooms like a flower of the field; a wind passes by and it is no more, its own place no longer knows it (Psalms 103:15-16).

But is there a way to gain eternal life, even if our days are limited? There certainly is – by helping to maintain the values that are so integral to our own lives. If we understand that our tzedakah represents much more than giving to bricks and mortar but means giving to ideas that will continue to exist after we have gone, then I believe we will give generously as did our ancestors. It's a plan that doesn't need an expensive marketing campaign, but rather a heart that appreciates the true worth of our possessions.

Purim at Sinai?

Midrashic Moments

Rachel Turkienicz

As we're in the midst of the Hebrew months of Adar, we get closer to Purim and begin to immerse ourselves in the complex layers of that holiday. At the same time, we're reading Torah portions about the building of the Golden Calf, so it's natural to ask if these two moments in Jewish history speak to each other.

At first glance, they seem to be completely unrelated. The Golden Calf involves the slave generation liberated from Egypt, while Purim involves an exiled generation forced out of Israel. The leader of Israel at Sinai is Moses, a man chosen by God, while the leader of the Jewish people in Purim is Esther, a woman chosen by a foreign king. In fact, we could sit and count the differences for some time, an activity I highly recommend.

Yet with all the differences, it's surprising how the core of these events convey the same message. There are many interesting midrashim that ask questions about who is to blame for the Golden Calf. Of course, Israel and Aaron are at fault, but should it stop there?

Several midrashim speak of God holding Moses responsible for the actions of Israel, even referring to the nation as "your people" when speaking to Moses. Even more interesting are the midrashim that speak of Moses holding God responsible for the Golden Calf.

According to these midrashim, Moses believes God is responsible, since God placed Israel in Egypt, a nation that worships calves, and left them there to learn from the Egyptians. In other words, what did God expect?

Similarly in the Purim story, there are many midrashim that place the Jews at the opening parties of the Megillah. In fact, the sages go one step further, stating that the utensils of the Temple were being desecrated at these parties and the Jewish people were willingly participating. The great questions of identity that arise through the Purim story can equally be attributed to a circumstance of situating Jews in the middle of a foreign culture and leaving them there.

But it's not the trappings of foreign ideology that are the threat. Israel isn't standing at the bottom of Mount Sinai arguing with Aaron about the benefits of Divine/human incarnation and the existential realities of Egypt. Philosophy and ideology are not what's attracting them, just as in the Purim story there's no debate of Persian gods and the benefits of idolatry at the parties.

The midrashim in which Moses blames God for the Golden Calf are quite specific about the problem. Moses is angry that God gave Israel so much wealth when they left Egypt. It's that wealth that allowed them to create the Golden Calf and put their trust in a materialistic god. Who wants an invisible Creator when we can have a gold one?

Likewise in the Purim story, we see a Jewish people surrounded by opulence, royal wealth and festivities. The challenge lies in becoming too entrenched in the heights of materialism, to the point of losing touch with the core of who you are.

The midrash likens it to a man who cares for his son, washes and anoints him and hangs a purse of money around his neck. Then the man places the son in front of a brothel and walks away.

It's not the materials themselves that are the problem. It's what we, as a generation, choose to do with them.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Relevance of the ancient world

A parent at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) recently asked me why their child should study ancient history. It was an obvious question in a society that is dominated by the Internet, Facebook and Twitter.

Yet for a school such as CHAT, the importance of studying the ancient world should be obvious. This world gave birth to us as a people as well as the traditions that have helped to define us.

Abraham, our patriarchal ancestor, came from the city of Ur in ancient Mesopotamia (modern Iraq). Ur was a great city at dawn of history. It belonged to the Sumerian civilization, which was almost unknown a century ago. A series of archeological digs in the early 20th century, culminating in the excavations of the Englishman Sir Leonard Wooley, at Ur, showed what a brilliant culture the Sumerians possessed.

The Yale scholar Samuel Noah Kramer, in his book titled History Begins at Sumer, highlighted the debt we owe to this ancient civilization. The Sumerians first invented writing, as well as our sexigesimal system of time-keeping based on the number six. They also invented the arch and, most importantly, the wheel.

Our connection with Mesopotamia would be maintained throughout our history. The Mesopotamian Empire of Assyria destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel and dispersed most of its inhabitants, giving rise to the story of the Ten Lost Tribes. Shortly thereafter, another Mesopotamian empire, that of Babylon, under the leadership of Nebuchadnezzar, would destroy Jerusalem and Solomon's Temple, sending many of its inhabitants into exile in

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

Babylon, the "Big Apple" of its day. Even after the Persian king, Cyrus, defeated the Babylonians, many of our people chose to remain there.

Babylon would become the centre of Jewish culture for more than 1,000 years. The holiday of Purim celebrates our deliverance from the evil machinations of Haman, the vizier of the Persian king who also ruled Babylon at the time. We all celebrate the deeds of Mordechai and Queen Esther in helping to save our people. But what many of us do not realize is that the name Mordechai comes from the Babylonian god, Marduk, and it means "Marduk lives." Furthermore, the name Esther comes from the Babylonian goddess Astarte, or Ishtar.

In the case of ancient Egypt, the connections are even more obvious. Although Abraham came from Ur, he also travelled to Egypt. Most importantly, the Exodus from Egypt lies at the heart of our tradition. It's impossible to imagine the Ten Commandments and Passover without it.

One of the reasons that I worked so hard to get the Dead Sea Scrolls to the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto for an 2009-10 exhibit was so that people in our community could see the relevance of these ancient documents for us in the present. It was also a way of showing others our historical connection to the Land of Israel.

There can be no more fitting connection of our ancient history to the present than by having our students at CHAT involved in an archeological excavation in Israel. It would embody everything that CHAT stands for – love of Israel as well as rigorous scholarship.

Mystical power of mezuzot, Pt. 2

As you skim through the many mezuzot sites on the web, you realize that this small piece of parchment plays a major role in Jewish ethical thought and mysticism.

First, an ethical lesson. I like the way http://Chabad.org deals with the following.

Question: We have young children. Can I place the mezuzah lower so that they could reach it to kiss it?

Answer: Do not place the mezuzah lower than the mandated height. Instead, lift your children up to the mezuzah. You'll be instilling in them – and yourself – a valuable lesson: if an ideal is beyond your reach, strive upward towards it, instead of compromising the ideal just because it is beyond your reach. [http://bit.ly/mezuz09]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

That lesson seems to have worked for Belle Rosenbaum. When Belle was a child, her grandfather would lift her to kiss the mezuzah. Years later, she began to collect mezuzot cases from around the world. Rosenbaum went on to write her doctoral thesis about her collection. Next time you're in Jerusalem, be sure to visit Jerusalem's Great Synagogue where you'll find the Rosenbaum Mezuzah Collection. [http://bit.ly/mezuz10]

In addition to being a reminder that you are in a Jewish home, the mezuzah has long been viewed as having protective qualities. The Jerusalem Talmud tells the story of Persian King Artvon, who sent Rabbi Yehuda HaNasi an expensive stone and requested something of equal value. So "Rabbi Yehuda HaNasi wrote a mezuzah and sent it to him in return. When King Artvon received the mezuzah, he said, 'I sent you something of great value, and you send me a cheap piece of parchment in return.' Rabbi Yehuda HaNasi answered, 'You sent me something for which I will have to hire a watchman to protect it, whereby I sent you something that will offer you protection.'" [http://bit.ly/mezuz11]

Many remarkable stories have been told about people who have recovered from illnesses after a faulty mezuzah was replaced with a kosher one. In one case, someone suffering from eye problems discovered that the Hebrew words for "your eyes" – aynaychem – had been misspelled in his bedroom mezuzah. When the mezuzah was replaced, the medical problem reportedly disappeared. [http://bit.ly/mezuz12]

That concept troubled Rabbi Martin Gordon. In 1977, he wrote an article in the journal Tradition titled, "Mezuzah: protective amulet or religious symbol?" After a lengthy analysis, he concluded that "the only legitimate criterion by which the efficacy of mitzvah of mezuzah should be measured is the depth relationship with God that it inspired. While the technical accuracy of the inscription is important, [a disqualified mezuzah] cannot be of such ominous proportions as the protective view would have us believe." [http://bit.ly/mezuz13]

Regardless of who's right, I particularly like this mezuzah story – with a bit of a twist. A rabbi was approached by a neighbour who was concerned that his kids were becoming very religious. The neighbour didn't know what to do. Using some reverse logic, the rabbi responded, "Check your mezuzot. Maybe they're kosher!" [http://bit.ly/mezuz14]

Simpsons have travelled to Canada, Israel

In addition to discussing The Simpsons, Reiss, who grew up in a small town in Connecticut, touched on the extent of his Judaism.

"I'm Jew...ish. And by that I mean I would never eat a ham sandwich. On Yom Kippur. In a synagogue. If there was anybody watching.

"The hardest part about growing up in a small town is that I look so Jewish. I mean, I put myself through college modelling for hate literature," he joked.

Many of the show's cast and crew are also Jewish. "About half of our writing staff is Jewish, and so is the other half. The place is sort of like a kibbutz, only more Jewish."

"[Cast members] Julie Kavner, Hank Azaria and Harry Shearer [are Jewish]. The voices of Bart, Patty, Selma, Principal Skinner, Burns, Smithers, Moe and Disco Stu are all Jewish. The Reverend Lovejoy is Jewish. Super Christian Ned Flanders, Jewish. Apu the Hindu, well, he's a Jew too. One Jewish character on the show, Krusty, is played by an Italian guy. But the Italian chef on our show is played by a Jew."

The 23 writers for the show, Reiss said, are a diverse group, consisting of "some men, two women... [and] one guy who's half black," as well as three Canadians who cannot be kept apart.

"Every time we turn around we see the three of them sitting in a corner, like it's Canadian Tire on a Saturday... we'll go, 'You go to Malibu, you go to North Hollywood and you fly to New York.' And we turn around and boom! All three of them are in the corner again, drinking Tim Hortons coffee."

The Simpsons have done their fair share of travelling, including to Japan, Brazil and France – and the show has ended up getting banned or sued as a result, said Reiss.

"There are only two countries the Simpsons have visited that did not complain about their treatment on the show. [They were] Canada and Israel. Why? Because Canadians and Jews have a great sense of humour and no self-esteem whatsoever."

Reiss wrapped up by thanking the UJA for allowing him to address a diverse group, everyone from "lawyers to attorneys."

Bank accused of Hezbollah ties

Compiled by CJN Staff

The U.S. government has accused the Beirut-based Lebanese Canadian Bank (LCB) of ties with Hezbollah and engaging in money laundering for an international narcotics trafficking ring whose proceeds support the terrorist organization.

The bank has a representative office in Montreal, its only overseas presence.

On Feb. 10, the U.S. Treasury Department issued a warning that U.S. financial institutions are prohibited from certain dealings with LCB.

Hundreds of millions of dollars, the proceeds of illicit drug sales, are moved through the bank each month, Washington says.

Court says no to taxi driver

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Cote St. Luc cab driver Arieh Perecowicz vowed last Thursday to take his case to the Supreme Court if he had to, after a municipal court judge found him guilty of having contraband articles in his car.

Judge Dominique Joly ruled there was no basis to accept Perecowicz's argument that in including religious articles among items prohibited in his taxi for not being, "necessary for the taxi to be in service," Montreal taxi code by-law 98 violated his freedom of expression and religion guarantees under the Quebec and Canadian human rights charters.

The items included a photo of the late Lubavitcher rebbe Menachem Schneerson, two mezuzot, a Canadian flag, as well as a Remembrance Day poppy and family photos.

Until his appeals are exhausted, Perecowicz promised he would continue to keep the items in his car.

He also has brought his case to the Quebec Human Rights Commission, which has not yet ruled on it.

Since 2006, Perecowicz, who has driven a taxi for 44 years, amassed eight tickets amounting to $1,400 in fines. In this trial, the court only dealt with the first four. He got the last one only a few weeks ago.

"I am confident a higher court will reverse the judgement," a clearly crestfallen Perecowicz, 66, told a throng of reporters outside the courtroom. "The decision sets back human rights guaranteed by the Quebec and Canadian charters."

Despite losing, however, Perecowicz was grateful the judge was lenient by ordering him to pay a total of $1, 300, almost half of which counted as courts costs.

In her 33-page ruling following seven days of testimony going back to September 2009, Joly said that Perecowicz failed to convince the court that his religion "requires him to display these items in his vehicle.

"In fact, he likes to have those objects in view for his personal comfort, no more," she opined.

Therefore, "there is no need to go further in the analysis. The court can only conclude that the defendant has not discharged himself of the burden of proof."

However, Perecowicz said his case is the only one where a ticket has been issued for carrying religious articles.

"Why, for the other 20,000 drivers, do they allow crosses, Madonnas, beads, [or] pictures of their children," he asked The CJN before the ruling. "Why only my children, my rebbe, my mezuzah, aren't allowed? It's discrimination."

Joly also rejected the argument of Perecowicz, who defended himself throughout, that the bylaw was too vague. She concluded it is simply phrased and presents, "no great difficulty in interpretation. It is neither vague nor imprecise."

Media start asking hard questions about Egypt

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Following the media's adrenaline rush in covering the aspirations of Egyptians for freedom, culminating in president Hosni Mubarak's being forced from office, there was a noticeable pause as many journalists asked: "What's next?"

They came to the sober realization that with the army still in control, Egypt remained under martial rule, even though the military council promised constitutional reform to be completed by the end of the month and elections (both presidential and parliamentary) within six months. Yet, as of mid-February, the emergency regulations had not been suspended as the protesters have demanded.

Increasingly, journalists started asking the difficult questions. Is genuine liberal democracy about to emerge from a country that has never known it? Will the army which has a stake in a substantial part of the economy give up the benefits and other perks to civilian government control? If economic conditions don't improve quickly for the bulk of Egypt's 80 million citizens, the vast majority of whom are extremely poor, will this result in even greater appeal for the only other highly organized body in the country, the Muslim Brotherhood? And how will the army in any event deal with the Brotherhood, which is officially recognized and likely to become part of any future government?

Right now, these are all open questions, as is the one most concerning to Israelis: will a future Egyptian government stand by the 1979 peace treaty?

Can Egypt afford not to? Let's not forget that former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat didn't sign a peace treaty with Israel as a favour to the Jews. He signed it to stop his country's economy from imploding under the enormous financial strain of sustaining a belligerent footing against Israel, and losing war after war since 1948.

Last week saw further attention focused on the Muslim Brotherhood.

Ayatollah Khomeini

French philosopher and author Bernard Henri-Levy wrote in the Huffington Post (Feb. 15) that "there is no evidence that confirms that [the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood has] undergone the profound change described by the distinguished Islamologists who, for the past 30 years, have strung together blunders and errors of analysis, one after another."

This applies not only to "Islamologists" but also to those sympathetic to them.

The Wall Street Journal's Bret Stephens reminded us (also on Feb. 15) of the mistaken outlook of one such sympathizer. In 1979, international law professor Richard Falk argued in a New York Times opinion piece that Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini was indeed a "moderate." Falk wrote: "The depiction of [Khomeini] as fanatical, reactionary and the bearer of crude prejudices seems certainly and happily false... What is also encouraging is that his entourage of close advisers is uniformly composed of moderate, progressive individuals."

While Khomeini spent the last part of his exile in France leading his campaign against the Shah, he never feigned the language of freedom as it's understood in the West. Yet foolishly, he was feted there as a "liberator."

But, as Stephens reminds us, memories of that period are short, and the willingness of many now to be seduced by the smooth language of Brotherhood Islamists does have an impact. "It's easy to be taken in by the Brotherhood: Eight decades as a disciplined, underground organization, outwardly involved in charitable social work, have made them experts at tailoring messages to separate audiences," he noted.

Indeed, appropriating the Enlightenment discourse of individual rights, Brotherhood spokesperson Essam El-Errian insisted (speaking Feb. 13 to Voice of America), "We are calling for a civil state, moderate state, [and] a democratic state, equality, prosperity, justice for all and freedom for all citizens. All are equal. Egypt is not Iran."

What is particularly shocking is just how far-reaching this "Brotherhood-as-moderate" seduction has become. It's even seeped into the American security establishment. Stephens also mentioned that in Congressional testimony earlier this month, James Clapper, director of national intelligence, said that the Brotherhood is a "largely secular" organization. The fact that his office quickly issued a correction to Clapper's idiocy is hardly reassuring. It fails to compensate for the ignorance and incompetence at such high levels.

Book celebrates 60 years of Canada-Israel diplomacy

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

In 2009, Canada and Israel celebrated 60 years of formal diplomatic relations.

Late last year, the two countries jointly published a 59-page commemorative book of historic photos and facts about the decades-long relationship.

The book, Canada-Israel Diplomatic Relations: Celebrating 60 years of successful relations, is a trilingual ode – it's written in English, French and Hebrew – to the nations' achievements as allies and democracies.

A copy was sent to The CJN in December 2010 by the Canadian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT).

The book's forward states that Canadians and Israelis are now, more than ever, bound by numerous ties.

"These ties and the long-standing commitments between our governments have resulted in an abundance of bilateral agreements and co-operation," it states.

A chronological, pictorial sequence of diplomatic events follows, from Canada's participation in 1947 on the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine – then-Canadian Supreme Court justice Ivan C. Rand helped garner support on the committee for partition and the eventual creation of the State of Israel – through to current Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon's 2009 visit to Israel.

Canada officially began diplomatic relations with Israel in 1949 when it formally recognized the state.

The volume also lists and depicts numerous legal, economic and cultural milestones shared between both countries including partnerships on space research, symphony orchestra and ballet troupe exchanges and the 1997 Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement (CIFTA). The latter has helped triple bilateral trade between the nations to $1.8 billion in 2008, up from $567 million in 1997.

Closing passages penned by the current Israeli and Canadian prime ministers, Benjamin Netanyahu and Stephen Harper, express the hope of continued friendship and co-operation between the countries.

"All of my life Israel has been a symbol – a symbol of hope and faith," Harper writes.

"Canada stands side-by-side with the State of Israel... We have stood with Israel even when it has not been popular to do so, and we will continue to stand with Israel, just as I have always said we would."

Israeli Ambassador to Canada Miriam Ziv said the book was a collaborative effort between her embassy and DFAIT which sought to "tell the story of the special relationship between Canada and Israel. It is a keepsake of the unique friendship between our two countries that members of the community can enjoy for years to come."

For those interested, there are still a number of free copies of the book available. For more information on how to obtain one, contact the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa at info@ottawa.mfa.gov.il

SINGERS VISIT ISRAEL: Renanim Youth Singers visited Israel last month as part of a concert tour. Twenty children, ranging in age from 10 to 19 went on the trip, with concerts scheduled at such diverse venues as Beth Halochem and Yad Lakashish Seniors Centre in Jerusalem, the Renanim School for Developmentally Delayed Children in Kiryat Shmonah, the Leo Baeck School in Haifa, Tzipori Bet Sefer (a predominantly Ethiopian school) in Tel Aviv, as well as an outdoor concert in the Old City of Jerusalem for three Birthright groups. The group also performed tikkun olam projects — packing gift boxes for Israeli soldiers with the children at Tzipori Bet Sefer and painting the sanctuary of an Ethiopian Community Synagogue. The children attacked these projects with the same enthusiasm they showed for their singing.

LIVING CREATURES: As part of their science unit on Living Things, all three Grade 1 classes at Netivot HaTorah had a visit from Marty Cummings and his Critters. The students learned many interesting facts about snakes, rabbits, millipedes and turtles just to name a few. They each had the opportunity to touch and feel many of the animals. The boys and girls were fascinated with their guests. Seen here, from left, are Sara and Lea and their millipedes.

The family of the late

wishes to express our sincere appreciation to our family and friends for their support, condolences and donations made on behalf of our dear husband, father and Zaida.

In Appreciation

is humbled and inspired by the generous outpouring of love and support we received from family, friends and the community. Because of you we were able to take our daughter Alexis to Israel to receive a potentially life saving Haplo Identical Stem Cell transplant. Sadly, Alexis did not survive due to complications. However, because of your support she went to Israel full of hope. We would like to express our heartfelt appreciation for all that was done in order for Alexis to receive this treatment and for the love and concern we continue to receive since returning home.

Thank you for sharing our hope and our sorrow. Your thoughtfulness is appreciated and will never be forgotten. We are proud to be part of such a wonderful, caring community.

Conference held to counter Israeli Apartheid Week

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The tensions between Zionist and anti-Israel students on North American campuses are a reflection of the larger issue of anti-Zionism and antisemitism that is rampant in mainstream society, said Boston University's Richard Cravatts, one of the speakers at a conference last week titled "When Middle East Politics Invade Campus."

The conference was moderated by Jonathan Kay, the National Post comment pages editor, and organized by the Advocates for Civil Liberties, a group that aims to counter unbalanced, anti-Israel messages on university campuses. It was planned as a response to the annual series of anti-Israel events on campuses worldwide, called Israeli Apartheid Week, held every March since 2005.

Afroza Mohammed

Cravatts, director of Boston University's publishing and digital media program, and author of Genocidal Liberalism: The University's Jihad Against Israel, delivered a lecture titled "The War Against Israel On Campus" to more than 300 people at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Toronto.

Cravatts borrowed an idea from Melanie Phillips, author of The World Turned Upside Down: The Global Battle Over God, Truth, and Power, in which she explains that "the Palestinian cause specifically has been inverted in a morally incoherent way so that the aggressive Arab states have been turned into the victims of the Zionist Jews of Israel."

Cravatts said that Israel's image has been "hijacked" by Israel's enemies "who are trying to reshape the narrative of what Israel is and represents."

He said student groups put up posters on campuses that display "carefully crafted images that help the world come to the conclusion that the Palestinians are the victims – not the victims of their own misdeeds, not the victims of the rest of the Arab world that refuses to let them ever have a state and has kept them dispossessed and homeless – it's Israel's fault."

He said anti-Israel protesters have also resorted to equating Zionism with Nazism.

"Israelis now are regularly called the new Nazis – that they are now perpetrating on the hapless Palestinians the same behaviour that was perpetrated on the Jews by the Nazis."

He said that it's challenging for students to combat anti-Israel sentiments on campus, because professors are incorporating their biases into their course syllabi.

"This is why campuses are fertile ground for anti-Israel activity and why you students have such a fight on your hands… because it is clearly departments of sociology, anthropology and humanities who are driving this discourse against Israel."

Cravatts insisted that the tensions on campus are important, because university students today are being shaped into the politicians, ambassadors and policy makers of the future.

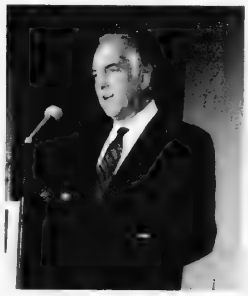
"We don't want them coming out of college thinking that Israel is the main impediment to world peace," he said.

"We have to say that if you're going to say stuff like this, we have the right to correct you. We have the right to stand up. We're going to make trouble, and I think we have a moral commitment to do that."

Sara Akrami, a second-year political science student at York University who emigrated from Iran five years ago and is an Iranian human rights activist, spoke on a panel of students about the tensions on campus between anti- and pro-Israel groups.

"I think part of the tension on campus is because some of the clubs promote violence, and it is very unfortunate that these types of clubs have been ratified by the York Federation of Students and [student] money has been used at times for these clubs," Akrami said.

"It is very disappointing that the university uses [student fees] in order to bring speakers who support terrorism," she said, referring to the lecture given at York last November by former British MP George Galloway.



Richard Cravatts

Afroza Mohammed, a fourth-year sociology student at York, also spoke on the panel about what she has witnessed on campus over the past four years from the eyes of a "neutral student" who is "not involved politically, culturally, religiously, emotionally, and has no stake in this conflict."

Despite that, the conflict on campus has affected her education at York, she said, because she and other students have been "forced to surrender our student space and have that space turned into hate space," and their "concerns for safety have been neglected during the Israeli Apartheid Week."

She said student rallies that pit one side against another "don't make me feel safe or make me feel that York is a tolerant and accepting university."

Noah Kochman, speaking as a former chair of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, said Jewish students need to be "smart, strategic and open-minded" when it comes to handling the tensions on campus.

"Many of our battles are long-term battles."

He said Jewish students should exert their influence by immersing themselves in student unions to play their part, and the rest of the community also needs to get involved and "step up."

In a video greeting, Israeli judge Hadassa Ben Itto, best known for her book The Lie That Wouldn't Die: The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, warned the gathering that public opinion is forming based on the information available, which sometimes is "biased and tainted by lies."

She said that she's disappointed that some universities "are at the forefront of spreading distorted information, questioning the legitimacy of Israel, while lending a forum to a dictator guilty of incitement to genocide, promoting boycotts, presenting a one-sided biased picture, expelling by force speakers who try to set the record straight or just present a different set of facts."

She added that "holding the planned apartheid week next month at any university is outrageous," and that the organizers of the event "prove that they know nothing about Israel, nothing about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but more than that, they know nothing about apartheid."

Not only is multiculturalism in the Charter, it has been government policy since the 1970s. The federal government and most provinces have enacted human rights codes that prevent discrimination on the basis of race, religion and other identifiable characteristics, while in 1988 the Canadian Multiculturalism Act acknowledged the right of ethnic groups to preserve their unique cultural heritage.

Mansur believes the act is a mistake. His paper argued that "the worm inside the doctrine of multiculturalism is the lie that all cultures are worthy of equal respect and equally embracing of individual freedom and democracy. The concerted assault by the Islamists on the essential and life-affirming values based on individual rights and freedoms are proof of this lie."

Contacted in London, where he lectures at the University of Western Ontario, Mansur said multiculturalism "undermines liberal democracy," which promotes individual rights and freedoms, not group rights.

Salim Mansur

The catalyst that got people discussing the wisdom of the policy of multiculturalism was 9-11, he continued. Cameron's warnings about British society, that young Muslims were embracing extremist ideology and not adopting western values, is relevant for Canada.

"We're just 10 years behind Britain," he said.

Mansur's comments came around the time the Quebec National Assembly decided to ban Sikhs from wearing kirpans, a ceremonial dagger, in the legislature.

Objecting to the measure, Canadian Sikhs argued the Supreme Court of Canada decided in 2006 that the kirpan is an article of faith — not a weapon.

Meanwhile, in Winnipeg, school officials were being asked to reconcile immigrants' cultural and religious practices to Canadian norms. A group of 11 recently arrived Muslim families asked the city's public schools to exempt their children from music and co-ed gym classes. Reports from Winnipeg indicated officials are considering having Muslim children do a written project on music as an accommodation – suggesting the school division was bending on a core component of the curriculum.

That is precisely the wrong approach to take, believes Ezra Levant, conservative activist and former publisher of the Western Standard magazine. Faced with requests for accommodation, school bureaucrats "ask how can we be sensitive and avoid a human rights complaint," even if they would be empowering "gender apartheid," he said. "It's the suicide gene of the left. They're so tolerant, they're afraid to call out intolerance."

"Most of this creeping sharia [Islamic law] is where the bulk of the problems are… The greatest tragedy here is that people are bending over backwards thinking that helps Muslims, but they are harming Muslims."

Levant believes giving in to such requests only empowers the extremists in the Muslim community.

That is hardly what the official policy of multiculturalism set out to do. According to a government of Canada website, "[Multiculturalism is a] fundamental characteristic of the Canadian heritage and identity. Canadians celebrate the gift of one another's presence and work hard to respect pluralism and live in harmony."

And as to integrating newcomers into Canadian society, Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney had this to say: "I think we have been much more successful generally than the western European countries."

Mansur, however, rejects any description of multiculturalism as a benign principle that makes everyone feel welcome in Canada. He believes "it divides and segments society. We have a fragmented society, home-grown terrorism, political correctness, so that you cannot discuss the system."

Recent immigrants are encouraged to retain their cultural baggage and as a result, "value systems are imported like polygamy, the inequality of sexes, limits to free speech and our government has bent over backwards to accommodate those groups."

A very different perspective was offered by Bernie Farber, chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress. Canada, he said, is a young country that has prospered by welcoming people from around the world. They are encouraged to bring with them their unique cultures that with all the others, have "built a strong and vibrant Canada."

Prime minister Pierre Trudeau "embraced that as part of the ethos of who we are and gave resources to make it strong and ensure we are not like the United States, where people get muddled into a [melting] pot," he said.

Mansur outlines Canadian values

please see cjnews.com

Congress has long supported the principle of multiculturalism, which recognizes that as a community we are both Canadian and Jewish.

"Multiculturalism does not deny Canadianism. Quite the opposite. It allows us to be strong Canadians while allowing us to take a look at your culture and celebrate that as well," Farber said.

He said Cameron's rejection of multiculturalism was not applicable to Canada. Canada does not have the same problem of home-grown terrorism and the one case brought to light – the Toronto 18 – was condemned all-around, by Muslim-Canadians as well.

He worried that "those criticizing multiculturalism explain their concerns for the most part by targeting a small minority of immigrants and refugees with extremist religious views and use them as an example of the policy's failure. Does anyone really believe that if we were to abandon multiculturalism that these extremists would simply go away? In the United States, where the melting-pot concept is the norm, has this occurred? Generalizing the actions of a small extremist minority within immigrant communities to its entirety is a recipe for stereotyping at best and racism at worst."

Constitutional law expert and Congress president Mark Freiman said multiculturalism is included in the Charter as an interpretive tool and cannot be used to trump basic rights, such as freedom of speech and assembly, and security of the person.

"Multiculturalism does not say that whatever someone did in their country of origin is acceptable and would be welcomed in Canada. But it says the concept of many cultures is an enriching concept."

Levant, however, sees multiculturalism as encouraging groups to maintain cultural practices that contradict basic Canadian values. Hundreds of polygamist marriages have been solemnized in Canada by radical imams, contrary to Canadian law, while welfare cheques have gone out to multiple wives, signalling "a passive acceptance by the government."

Several honour killings have claimed the lives of young girls, while the most "shocking case" was in Ontario where the Court of Appeal ruled women may testify while wearing a veil and, if compelled to remove it, can ask that all men be excluded from the court while they testify, he said.

These "enables gender apartheid," he said.

Levant, who faced a human rights hearing over publishing the Mohammed cartoons, said during that incident, the Western Standard received many calls from Muslims saying they did not leave their countries of origin "to have sharia law follow me here. Many Muslims came here to get the hell away from the imams and gender apartheid," he said.

Nelson Wiseman, a professor of political science at the University of Toronto, said that every major party in Ottawa supports multiculturalism. "There is no political benefit to say no," to it, he said.

The Jewish community has historically supported it as well as intercultural dialogue. "The feeling is if all groups are secure, then Jews are as well, so anything that helps minority groups is of assistance to Jews, because Jews are a minority," he said.

"I don't think Jews think about [multiculturalism] much, and when they do, it's like when Poles, Ukrainians, Brits and a lot of the French, who when they hear 'multiculturalism' they don't think about their own group, but other groups that they're uncomfortable with," Wiseman said.

"The reality is that the face of Canada has changed and people react to that."

Exercise essential in managing diabetes

The latest research finds that exercise – specifically strength training – and a healthy diet, along with prescribed medications, are essential in managing Type 2 diabetes.

FITNESS CORNER
BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

There are four types of diabetes. Type 1 occurs when the pancreas can not produce insulin. This type is mostly found in children or adolescents. Type 2 occurs when the pancreas doesn't produce enough insulin for your body. This type occurs mainly in adults, but it's being found in children in increasing numbers. Gestational diabetes is temporary and happens during pregnancy. Pre-diabetes occurs when blood glucose levels are very high but not high enough for a Type 2 diagnosis.

More than nine million people are living with diabetes or pre-diabetes in Canada today, and 90 per cent are diagnosed with Type 2. Unmanaged diabetes can lead to heart disease, kidney disease, eye disease, impotence and permanent nerve damage.

A recent Canadian study found that strength training improves insulin sensitivity in those individuals with diabetes to the same extent that aerobic exercise does. Strength training improves the body's ability to control blood sugar levels, along with taking prescribed diabetes medications. In fact, in people with diabetes, strength training in combination with aerobic exercise may be more beneficial than diet alone.

Regular exercise improves your body's use of insulin, burns excess body fat, improves muscle strength, balance and bone density, and lowers blood pressure and low-density lipoprotein (LDL) cholesterol levels. It also increases energy, reduces stress and improves quality of life.

The American Diabetes Association recently updated its exercise guidelines to at least 2.5 hours of moderate exercise per week. Check with your doctor before you start any exercise program. It's important to work with a certified fitness professional and your health-care provider to establish realistic goals and design a safe, effective program that addresses your specific needs. Remember to always check your blood-sugar levels before every workout.

TEDDY BEAR DRIVE: Students in Daphne Helfand's grade 7A class crowd around a duffle bag bursting with stuffed bears after their recent teddy bear drive at the Toronto Heschel School. The bears were collected as part of a civics project that the students conceptualized and organized, and they'll be sent with a Heschel student to Israel for the children of Aleh, Israel's largest network of residential facilities for children with severe physical and cognitive disabilities.

My kid is so Jewish — where did I go wrong?

Orit Brenner
Special to The CJN

As parents, we do a wonderful job of instilling a sense of Jewish identity and pride in our children.

Perhaps we send them to Jewish day schools or extra-curricular Hebrew schools, or to Jewish summer camps, or on Jewish heritage trips such as Birthright Israel and the March of the Living.

We hold Pesach seders and family Chanukah parties, all in the hope of having our children absorb some of the values that we hold so near and dear to our hearts.

But what happens when our children grow up and begin to show some genuine interest in further exploring their Judaism – when they decide to step up their level of kashrut, for example, or to stop driving on Shabbat?

Many parents feel upset, even threatened or betrayed, by their child's movement toward taking Judaism more seriously.

But how can we logically blame our children for internalizing the very values that we have so dutifully and diligently striven to impart to them?

"Of course we want our children to be Jewish," many parents say, "but not that Jewish!"

But where do we draw that line? When does "Jewish" become "that Jewish?"

For each parent, the answer is different. Some feel that even the slightest departure from the family way borders on being blasphemous. Others allow for more leeway, but keep a watchful eye out to ensure that the situation doesn't get too out of hand.

Let's pause for a minute and ask ourselves a (or perhaps the) key question: what is it that we're afraid of?

Is not the ideal outcome of a proper Jewish education an individual who cares deeply and passionately about his or her Judaism, not only in theory but in practice?

Dedicated Jewish parents ought to feel pride and a sense of accomplishment when their child makes a move in this direction. They ought to view their child's passion for Judaism as an extension of, rather than a departure from, the education and tools that he or she has been given.

Instead of confusing children with mixed messages, let's demonstrate consistency in our parenting and our dedication to Jewish values. If we're able to do this, we will no doubt maintain strong relationships with our children and see them flourish into strong leaders and community members.

In search of missing Holocaust property

Israeli government, Jewish Agency launch task force

Raphael Ahren
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government and the Jewish Agency are launching a new worldwide initiative to identify Jewish property lost or stolen during the Holocaust with the goal of obtaining restitution for survivors or their heirs.

Called Project HEART - Holocaust Era Asset Restitution Task Force, the initiative is chaired by Rafi Eitan, a former senior citizen affairs minister, and directed by the Jewish Agency's Bobby Brown, a native New Yorker who has been active in the field of Holocaust restitution for more than a decade.

"This is the first time since the Holocaust that a general comprehensive program is being launched to gather information with the eventual purpose of receiving compensation for property looted, stolen or forcibly sold during the Holocaust," Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky said, according to a yet unpublished press release, a copy of which Ha'aretz obtained. "This will be an opportunity for many people to finally receive compensation for property that was taken from them and their families during the Holocaust era."

The project is expected to launch in early March with events in Jerusalem and Washington, D.C., and will be accompanied by a large advertising campaign to inform survivors and their families about the opportunity to make claims.

In its first stage, Project HEART, with an expected annual budget of around nine million (about $2.5 million US), will focus on identifying individuals with potential claims mainly against eastern European governments. Survivors or their heirs whose families owned private property – including real estate, movable items or intangible personal property – and have never been compensated will be asked to contact the project's staff. A website and a call centre available in 13 languages will be launched to facilitate the information gathering process.

"It is not necessary to have evidence of property ownership to be eligible. If individuals believe they owned or were beneficiaries of such property, they should fill out the questionnaire," said Anya Verkhovskaya, who is overseeing the initiative's operational aspects.

Verkhovskaya is senior executive vice-president and COO at A.B. Data, a company specializing in class action suits. Based on the Milwaukee-based company's extensive work on previous cases of Holocaust restitution claim, the Jewish Agency and the government hired the company to do the legwork, such as creating a call centre and setting up advertising campaigns.

Verkhovskaya played key roles in two major Holocaust restitution successes, including the $1.25 billion (US) settlement with Swiss banks, when she led programs that delivered notice to more than 10,000 Jewish communities in 109 countries. She also spearheaded the administration of international help and call centres that assisted more than 100,000 potential claimants.

The Jewish Agency's Jerusalem-based team meanwhile currently consists only of Brown, a retired Jewish Agency for Israel official who was rehired to lead the new project, along with his secretary and a lawyer.

"Unfortunately, Holocaust survivors are leaving this world at a very rapid rate, and even their children are now in their 60s. It is extremely important to get as accurate information as we possibly can for history's sake, for a memorial sake and for the sake of eventually coming forward in negotiations," Brown, 59, told Ha'aretz.

"We feel that this is a critical moment that maybe we waited much too long for, but nevertheless, if we don't do it now, we may have lost the last possibility of doing it altogether."

Project HEART, which will operate under the auspices of Deputy Minister of Senior Citizen Affairs Lea Nass, bases its hopes on a non-binding resolution passed during the 2009 Holocaust Era Assets Conference in Prague, in which the 46 participating countries agreed on their obligation to compensate Holocaust victims and their heirs for property lost on their territory.

Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky

Eastern European countries shortly before or immediately after the fall of communism passed legislation allowing Jews to claim restitution for property lost or stolen during the Holocaust. But due to restrictions, these countries compensated only a small number of Jews with minor payments, according to Moshe Sanbar, who has served in senior positions in several organizations fighting for Holocaust restitution.

"With the Prague Conference, we created a new basis for new claims – it wasn't legally binding, but it was and is binding morally," Sanbar told Ha'aretz.

"Looted property has to be restituted. This is part of European policy. Several American presidents have said that's our policy, and it's part of Israeli policy," said Brown, who first dealt with Holocaust restitution issues as Diaspora affairs adviser during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's first term. "Will we succeed? Time will tell. But we're sure going to try."

Project HEART sees itself as working in concert with the World Jewish Restitution Organization, Brown said. Based in Jerusalem, the Jewish Restitution Organization was founded in 1993 by 10 major Jewish bodies, including the Jewish Agency, the Center of Organizations of Holocaust Survivors in Israel and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany. "I hope that all NGOs that are now working in this field will join us in this effort," Brown told Ha'aretz.

The U.S.-based Claims Conference is today perhaps the best-known institution involved in fighting for restitution of property lost during the Holocaust. Founded in 1951, the group became one of the wealthiest Jewish organizations in the world after the fall of the Iron Curtain through the sale of buildings in eastern Germany that had belonged to Jews but whose heirs could not be located.

In recent years, the Claims Conference has been harshly criticized for the way it has been distributing funds. In 2006, a group of Israeli organizations, headed by the Israeli government and including the Jewish Agency, demanded that Israel be granted the right to appoint half the members of the Claims Conference's executive board to have a larger say in how its assets are distributed.

The Conference rejected the criticism, saying in response that the organization "has been outstandingly successful in negotiating for Holocaust-era compensation on behalf of Holocaust survivors worldwide in recovering property, in assisting Nazi victims and in educating future generations about the lessons of the Shoah." Earlier this year, a report by barrister Jeffrey Gruder, which was commissioned by the Board of Deputies of British Jews, criticized the Claims Conference's practice regarding returning funds received from Germany to their Jewish survivors or their heirs.

In an extensive response to the Gruder report, the Claims Conference stated that as of Dec. 31, 2009, a total of 3.5 billion shekels (about $1.5 billion US) "has been paid to or set aside for eligible original owners or heirs – all of whom would have received no property or payment were it not for the Claims Conference's intensive efforts since 1990.

"There is absolutely no basis for Mr. Gruder to presume that the Claims Conference did not and does not care about the interests of heirs. The Claims Conference has done a marvellous job, but they are limited to Germany and Austria," Brown told Ha'aretz.

"We are not focusing, at this point, on any one country. It is a wide net we're sending out, and hopefully we'll have established a registry for [survivors with legitimate claims], many of whom have given up hope of ever seeing any compensation. This is the last battle of the Holocaust, and it is our obligation to find a modicum of justice in this area."

Project HEART has received overwhelmingly positive responses from Israelis involved in Holocaust restitution issues.

"I support everything that will improve the conditions of Holocaust survivors. This is a good initiative that is more than welcome," said Knesset member Ze'ev Bielski. About three years ago, Bielski, who then headed the Jewish Agency, had a run-in with the Claims Conference, after he pushed for an audit of its books, and the conference reacted by temporarily stopping its funding of Jewish Agency projects, according to news reports at the time.

Sanbar, who founded the World Jewish Restitution Organization, also described Project HEART as an important initiative. Anticipating criticism by groups and individuals who might argue the new project's work will negatively impact on ongoing negotiations with relevant foreign governments, he said this scenario was unlikely.

"A.B. Data will try to help Bobby [Brown] to find all kinds of assets that belonged to Jewish people. The value of restitution is something completely different, something that is subject to negotiations."

Israel Briefs

PA presses UN vote

Backed by Arab states, the Palestinians are pressing ahead with a United Nations Security Council resolution that slams Israel for settlement building. The Palestinian delegation said last Thursday that it had the votes to bring the resolution to the UN Security Council for a vote the next day. The announcement, coming after a meeting of the 22-member "Arab group," which collectively has the clout to push a vote, signalled the Palestinian rejection of a compromise proposed this week by the United States calling settlement expansion a "serious obstacle to the peace process" in a statement to the Security Council. The U.S. statement – a nonbinding declaration that does not have the clout of a resolution – also would have condemned rocket fire from the Gaza Strip, restoring a semblance of balance to the Palestinian-drafted resolution, which singled out only Israel.

Israel closes embassies due to threats

Israel has temporarily shut down four of its diplomatic missions abroad, including the embassy in Ankara and the Israeli consulate in Istanbul, due to threats from Hezbollah, according to Turkey's Milliyet newspaper. Many Israeli embassies around the world were on heightened alert. The Foreign Ministry said that Israeli embassies throughout the world have received several suspected terror threats. The threat is believed to be directed at embassies in Africa, Southeast Asia and the Caucasus.

Schalit deal being discussed: report

Hamas and Israel are engaged in ongoing efforts to form a prisoner-exchange deal that would secure the release of abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Shalit, a Hamas source told the Palestinian Ma'an news agency last week. In January, the London-based newspaper Al-Hayat reported that a delegation of Hamas strongmen reportedly discussed the latest proposal for a prisoner exchange deal with organization political chiefs in Damascus. Earlier that month, Al-Hayat reported that the German Shalit talks mediator, Gerhard Conrad, concluded a two-day visit to the Gaza Strip where he held talks with senior Hamas leaders. Referring to the efforts to secure Shalit's release, an informed Hamas source told Ma'an last week that the German mediator was still involved the negotiations.

Smugglers abuse migrants

African migrants trying to cross from Egypt into Israel have been abused and held for ransom by Bedouin smugglers in the Sinai Desert, according to a new report. The report issued by the Israeli advocacy group, Hotline for Migrant Workers, presented information gleaned from the testimony of 60 migrants, who discuss being beaten, raped and held for ransom in the northern Sinai. The organization estimates that about 1,000 migrants, mostly Eritrean, have been held in abusive conditions for months. The Bedouin smugglers contact their families for ransom money. Some 13,600 mostly economic migrants crossed into Israel from Egypt in 2010; some are refugees from Sudan.

Tunisian Jews worried

Israeli media reported that Tunisia's Jewish community is concerned for its security in the wake of anti-Jewish protests outside of the capital's main synagogue, a community leader said. The head of the Tunisian Jewish community, Roger Bismuth, met with the country's interim prime minister, Mohammed Ghanoucci, and requested better security for the country's 1,500 Jews, the French news agency AFP reported. On Feb. 11, dozens of Muslim demonstrators gathered in front of the main synagogue in the capital, Tunis, and chanted anti-Jewish epithets. Last month, amid the political upheaval and violence in the African nation that toppled President Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, the Tunisian military deployed forces specifically charged with protecting the Jewish community on the southern island of Djerba and elsewhere. Among the 1,300 Jews in Tunisia, 1,100 are living in Djerba and the rest in Tunis.

Egypt blocks Suez crossings

Avi Issacharoff
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Suez Canal operators have been told that plans by two Iranian naval ships to cross the waterway were cancelled, a canal official said on Thursday.

It was not immediately clear which side was behind the cancellation, but the Al-Arabiya daily reported that Egyptian authorities had blocked the ships from crossing.

Any naval vessels passing through the canal, a strategic international shipping route that connects the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, must first have approval from Egypt's foreign and defence ministries, officials said.

If the ships had crossed, it would have been the first time since Iran's 1979 revolution that Iranian warships had passed through the canal, officials said.

Iran's revolution poisoned ties with Egypt, which signed a peace treaty with Israel that year.

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman last Wednesday called plans for the two Iranian warships to sail through the canal en route to Syria a "provocation." He had said the ships were expected to pass through the Suez Canal overnight on Wednesday.

Israel's Channel One television said Lieberman had spoken out of turn as the Defence Ministry "had preferred to ignore" the ships' approach.

An Egyptian canal official who declined to be named said that the Suez Canal Authority was "informed today about the cancellation of two scheduled trips of two Iranian warships," adding that "no new date was set to cross the Suez as part of the southern convoy coming from the Red Sea."

The official, who identified the ships as the Alvand and Kharg, said the vessels were near the Saudi Arabian Red Sea port of Jeddah. Shipping experts had earlier named the vessels as the Alvand frigate and Kharg supply ship.

Ahmed El Manakhly, a member of the canal's board who is responsible for shipping movement, had said the ships had not joined Thursday's early morning northbound convoy in the canal and were not on the waiting list to pass through on Friday.

The Suez Canal is a vital commercial and strategic waterway between Europe and the Middle East and Asia. It is also a major source of revenues for the Egyptian government.

'Sense of desperation' in Iran

"The hypocrisy of the Iranian authorities' support for democracy in Egypt and the suppression of the same demands in Iran is outright unacceptable. The use of tear gas, batons and pepper spray against peaceful protesters by Iranian security forces is a gross violation of the right to free expression and assembly."

Cannon added that Canada condemns the regime's actions and the "systematic and violent suppression of peace demonstrations" and that the government will continue to call out Iran's "ongoing and unjustifiable violations of universal human rights" as a central part of Canada's foreign policy.

Cotler said he believes the increased oppression by the Ahmadinejad regime is a sign that international sanctions are working, pushing the Iranian government into a "sense of desperation" and eliciting a false "bravado" from lawmakers in the country.

He said he hopes the international community continues to strengthen those sanctions and that Canada, among other things, encourages Radio Canada International to "consider programming in Farsi" over both its worldwide shortwave service and conventional AM/FM broadcasting in the Persian Gulf region and over the Internet.

Cotler also recommended that the government take "appropriate action" to ensure that Iranian foreign offices, bureaus or media outlets in Canada are "not used by the Iranian regime as a source of threat and intimidation of the Iranian diaspora in Canada."

In Iran last week, thousands of government supporters called for the execution of opposition leaders at Friday prayers in Tehran, following anti-government demonstrations.

Hardline cleric Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati said during the prayers that the opposition leaders have lost their reputation among people and are "practically dead and executed," while worshippers chanted for their executions.

Jannati proposed more restrictions on Mir Hossein Mousavi and Mahdi Karroubi – two of the opposition leaders who remain under house arrest since the popular protests of 2009 – who managed to organize the largest opposition protest in more than a year on Feb. 14.

"Their communications with people should be completely cut. They should not be able to receive and send messages. Their phone lines and Internet should be cut. They should be prisoners in their home," Jannati said.

The head of Iran's judiciary, Ayatollah Sadeq Larijani, said last Thursday that opposition leaders would be prevented from communicating with their supporters and a possible trial was still on the agenda.

The remarks by these prominent figures, suggest there is still no concrete plan for arresting the opposition leaders, possibly to avoid giving them more public attention.

Late last Thursday, Karroubi's website, Sahamnews.net, quoted him as saying he was ready to stand trial.

The opposition demonstrations in Iran last week were meant to show solidarity with Egypt's uprising, but turned into a major opposition rally. Two people were killed in clashes with police.

Mousavi and Karroubi are leaders of a protest movement that grew out of the disputed presidential election in 2009, in which Ahmadinejad was re-elected.

Hundreds of thousands of protesters poured into the streets after the re-election of Ahmadinejad, calling it fraudulent. Opposition says scores were killed after the massive government crackdown.

Reporter beaten in Egypt

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

CBS News' chief foreign correspondent, Lara Logan, sustained a "brutal and sustained sexual assault and beating" as Egyptian protests were winding down, CBS reported last week .

The assault lasted between 20 and 30 minutes while her assailants shouted "Jew! Jew! Jew!"

Logan, who is not Jewish, was on assignment in Egypt for 60 Minutes to cover the toppling of former Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and became separated from her camera crew and whisked away by the crush of the mob surrounding her, CBS reported.

Logan, 39, and a mother of two, then flew back to the United States, where she was hospitalized until last Wednesday.

According to CBS, the attack on Logan took place on the evening of Feb. 11, but went unreported by the outlet until Feb. 15.

According to reports, she was eventually saved by a group of women and the Egyptian police.

A week earlier, while on assignment, Logan and her crew had been blindfolded and detained by Egyptian authorities and were accused of being Israeli spies, according to CBS.

Egyptian revolution will impact entire Mideast

Charles Bronfman

Opinion

After Egypt's wondrous revolution, the Middle East will never be the same again. Egypt is so large and so consequential that such profound political change is bound to impact everything, including the prospects for Israeli-Palestinian peace. Is it a threat to peacemaking or an opportunity?

The idea that Israel and the Palestinians have, at long last, been given an ideal opportunity to come to a peaceful resolution of their long-standing differences might sound outlandish to some and heretical to those who think that Israel should now hunker down and prepare itself for armed conflict, or use the Egyptian crisis to gain more time to do nothing!

Charles Bronfman

Despite the fact that the peaceful revolution has succeeded, Egypt will have many problems on the way to democracy. The first is its economy, which was already struggling before the protests brought it to a temporary halt. The interim government and its freely elected successor will have to provide major incentives to business to invest in equipment and create the job opportunities that the people are demanding. Those who massed in Tahrir Square and elsewhere throughout the country no doubt will lack patience. Those who have graduated from college and have been promised jobs by the former government must have access to them – not menial jobs, but the serious jobs that the educated youth expect in a sophisticated society.

As Egypt's neighbour, Israel can help. Israel's technological brilliance, her breakthroughs in so many fields, from irrigation to nanotechnology, can be of huge advantage to a new democratic Egypt that is in search of 21st-century jobs for its young people. The Palestinians are benefitting from an important increase in their standard of living, at least on the West Bank. That could be a helpful signal for both Jordanians and Egyptians that with the proper infrastructure economic advances certainly are possible.

But first, Israelis and Palestinians must end their conflict by establishing clear and recognized borders between two states living in peace. So long as they prey on each other, their ability to relate positively to the events around them will be hampered. In fact, from Israel's standpoint, the status quo will have a profound negative influence.

Israel is no longer considered the David, surrounded by the Arab Goliath. Nor has it been since 1982. Israel is now viewed in the Arab world and beyond as Goliath, protected by the United States. It is seen as an occupier denying freedom to the Palestinians as surely as Hosni Mubarak denied freedom to the Egyptian people. As long as it fails to end the occupation, Israel will be seen to be on the wrong side of history.

That is a shame, for Israel, as the first democracy in the Middle East could do so much to help Arab democracy emerge from the ice age imposed by its autocratic leaders.

Imagine a reformed, democratic Egypt; a peaceful, democratic Palestine; a Jordanian constitutional monarchy; and a democratic Israel, no longer considered a pariah by its neighbours, no longer an occupying nation, no longer the "imperialist" country of the Middle East. Imagine how co-operation between these democracies could lead and benefit the rest of the region, politically and economically.

When Shimon Peres dreamed of a "new Middle East" two decades ago, the region was not yet ready for his vision. But today the Internet and new social media have made the 21st century revolution possible in Egypt. These cheap and efficient means of connecting people defy physical borders as much as they defy governmental controls.

Imagine if Israel's tech-savvy youth connected with their Egyptian, Palestinian, and Jordanian counterparts and rose up in unison to demand that their elders put an end to their 20th-century conflicts. Would Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Mahmoud Abbas then respond by creating their own peaceful revolution?

Let the Egyptian people's example guide them in breaking the bonds of fear and mistrust. Let them now garner the courage to go forward and let peace no longer elude them.

Foundation keeps Jerusalem strong for all Jews

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

Sallai Meridor has dedicated his life to Israel and to Jerusalem.

He's been an adviser to two Israeli cabinet ministers – the defence minister and and the minister of foreign affairs – and he was the chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization. Then he went on to become Israel's ambassador to the United States.

For the past year, Meridor has been the international chairman of the Jerusalem Foundation, a volunteer position he assumed in 2009.

"I am proud to have the opportunity to join other [volunteers] in strengthening Jerusalem. It gives me a great sense of satisfaction," says Meridor, 55, who was born and raised in Rehavia and now lives with his wife and three daughters in Kfar Adumim.

"For me, it's a combination between a great privilege and a great responsibility. Jerusalem is the most wonderful city on earth, in my humble opinion, and I feel Jerusalemite in every bit of my soul."

Meridor, whose family came to Israel in the 1930s from Vienna, can remember a time when the city was divided. "Jerusalem was every day in our upbringing – it was every day in our hearts. My father would take us to different spots and look toward the Old City. We could not even see the Wall, but we lived with the dream of seeing the city reunited," he recalls. "We lived to see that dream come true."

Nowadays, the city faces different challenges – from maintaining positive relations between the various disparate factions of Jerusalem's population to strengthening the economic viability of the city.

Meridor says the population of tax-contributing, Zionist Jews in Jerusalem is shrinking relative to the Arab and haredi populations, a trend that doesn't bode well, either for the city's economic future or its global Jewish status.

"If the percentage of those working in the city is shrinking and those in need of social welfare is widening, in the end the economy could collapse," says Meridor. "We want to keep Jerusalem relevant and meaningful and strong, not only for its inhabitants, but for all Israelis and all Jewish people."

The biggest current issue, he says, is the negative migration from the city of young people and families. "We have to work hard to keep young families, to create conditions for those people to choose to stay in the city. It's a major challenge."

Sallai Meridor

The Jerusalem Foundation, which works in conjunction with the municipality, aims to improve Jerusalem's elementary-level education options. "We want to make the Jerusalem [grade] school experience the best in Israel so that young families, whose number 1 criteria for choosing where to settle is their children's education, will choose Jerusalem," says Meridor. "We want to create a community environment that is supportive, that people will like to join rather than leave."

The foundation is working with students at the city's academic institutions. According to Meridor, thanks to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design and other colleges, Jerusalem is home to some 40,000 students every year. The question is, how to get them to stay in Jerusalem and create a life for themselves in the city after they graduate.

"We need to create opportunities for them to stay in the city after they've completed their studies," says Meridor. "This focus on young people is extremely important. They are the future and the most important asset for us to develop."

Besides working directly with students, the foundation has its sights set on improving the city and making it more appealing to this population by encouraging the development of leisure opportunities in the city centre.

"We want to create more opportunities for enjoying leisure time in the city – museums, sports, culture – so that while people feel that Jerusalem, with all its sacred holiness must be preserved, they also feel they can live modern lives that are no different from anywhere else in Israel," says Meridor. "We want to help people enjoy life in Jerusalem in a significant way and at the same time strengthen the positioning of the city, so that it will be a cool place to live."

On this score, Meridor says the Canadian Jewish community has been instrumental. "The Canadian community has been outstanding in its support of Jerusalem's city centre," he says.

For example, it's thanks in large part to funding from the Canadian community that the city's central open market, Mahane Yehuda, is the tourist attraction it is today. "It used to be a place that people would stay away from, and now people from Tel Aviv come to stroll there," says Meridor.

Currently, the Canadian community is helping to achieve similar results in the city's Musrara neighbourhood. "We are taking a neighbourhood that has been very challenging and turning it around to become a centre, a magnet, for young people," says Meridor.

"We are very proud of the significant partnership of Jews in Canada in Jerusalem, and Jews in Canada should be very proud of their share in our Jerusalem. I mean that in the largest sense possible," says Meridor. "After 2,000 years that we could only pray for Jerusalem, now we have the opportunity to take part in building the city and making it what we were dreaming of."

'Israeli bandage' helped save lives in Giffords shooting

Ron Kampeas
JTA

WASHINGTON — Israel changed Gabrielle Giffords' life when the budding politician first visited the country in 2001 and it drew her closer to Judaism.

After the Arizona congresswoman was shot in the head last month, an Israeli innovation invented by an American immigrant to Israel may have helped save her life.

First responders credited the emergency bandage colloquially known as "the Israeli bandage" with saving lives in the aftermath of the Jan. 8 shooting in Tucson, Ariz., that left six dead and 13 wounded.

Pima County officials later displayed the kit at a news conference in Tucson, along with other military-grade gear used in ministering to the wounded in the shooting. The county had switched to the upgraded gear last June, and the shooting was its major first field test.

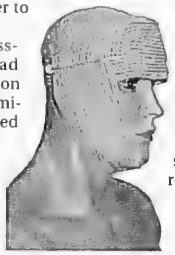
"Without this care, it would have definitely been a different situation," Dr. Katherine Hiller, who had attended the wounded at University Medical Center, told the Los Angeles Times.

It is not clear if the Israeli bandage was applied to Giffords – the details of the day were lost in the chaos – but the bandage is known for, among other things, its utility in stanching head wounds, one of the greatest challenges with conventional bandages. One model covers both entry and exit wounds, which Giffords is known to have sustained.

The bandage, like others, applies a sterile pad to the wound to stop the blood. What distinguishes it is that a built-in applicator applies the equivalent of up to 30 pounds of pressure over the pad by wrapping it in the opposite direction of the initial wrap.

Head wounds require multiple standard bandages to keep a pad in place. One Israeli bandage, with its elasticized cloth, is enough for a head wound, and the very act of wrapping it around the head applies pressure to the wound. That saves precious time, and the applied pressure applicator, because it is built-in, is more stable than the external pressures used with conventional bandages.

Since its 1993 invention, the Israeli bandage has become standard issue in militaries throughout the world. The U.S. military made it standard issue in 2003, in time for the Iraq War.



The Israeli bandage can be applied quickly and easily by an injured soldier or non-medical personnel for immediate hemorrhage control. [Israel 21c photo]

The inventor of the pad, Bernard Bar-Natan, is a self-described Brooklyn boy, a son of Holocaust survivors who immigrated to Israel in 1979 and was drafted into the military in 1983, serving an abbreviated service as an adult.

When he was going into the military, friends advised him to get a "job" or a specialty to alleviate the boredom of grunt-level service. Immigrants drafted as adults serve only a few months rather than three or more years, so they rarely serve in the military's upper reaches. One of the few specialties available at that level is medic.

As the years wore on, through month-long stints in the Israeli reserves, Bar-Natan became annoyed by an anomaly: the bandages available might have manufacture dates as early as 1942 or as late as the previous month, yet they remained essentially unchanged. Medics in the field were required to improvise pressure applicators – magazines, rocks, canteens, whatever was handy.

"The guns we used had improved, the planes flying above us had improved, but the bandages were the same," Bar-Natan told JTA.

In the early 1990s, the Israeli government was encouraging start-ups through "incubators," providing them low-interest loans. That encouraged Bar-Natan to jump in the waters with his idea for a newfangled bandage.

In 2000, he took the bandage to Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, Texas, where the U.S. military trains medics. Soon his company, First Care, was selling the bandage for use by elite units, including the 75th Rangers and the 101st Airborne. Three years later, the bandage was certified for standard use.

The Giffords shooting created unexpected – and unwanted – publicity for his invention.

"The real story is about her," Bar-Natan said.

He had heard about how Giffords on an American Jewish Committee trip to Israel in 2001 – shortly after she was first elected to the Arizona state legislature – had connected with her father's faith and decided to become a practising Jew.

Bar-Natan's success is not going unnoticed.

Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to Washington, told the conservative Daily Caller website recently that learning of the bandage's role in saving lives in Tucson has been a highlight of his stint as ambassador.

Canada, Israel to help India address water issues

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

India is facing tremendous problems with water management, pollution abatement and infrastructure renewal and it is turning to Canada and Israel for solutions.

Businessmen, academics and government officials from the three countries are gathering in Toronto this week in what is being called a landmark meeting that will lead to co-operation in tackling India's water quality problems.

The Trilateral Roundtable on Water Technologies is convening at St. Andrews Club and Conference Centre, under the auspices of International Science and Technology Partnerships Canada (ISTP-Canada). The agency, in co-operation with the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF), will provide financial incentives to Canadian and Israeli partners who develop commercially ready solutions for specific Indian projects that can also be applied in a global market, said Henri Rothschild, president and CEO of both agencies.

"The availability of fresh water is one of the most pressing imperatives facing India and many other nations around the world," he said. "It is an urgent issue that demands focused resources, multidisciplinary expertise and collaborative solutions. Leveraging a powerful platform for trilateral R&D co-operation and the complementary strengths of three countries, we are jump-starting the development of new water technologies that help to preserve and manage this life-giving resource and enable innovators to capitalize on global market opportunity."

This week's meeting is something of a get acquainted gathering, but plans are to stage a follow up session in India within one year. Rothschild believes there is potential for hundreds of millions of dollars in business in the short term plus the creation of thousands of jobs in Canada and Israel.

Ontario is the prime Canadian player at the moment, as the province already has bilateral trade agreements with both India and Israel, managed by ISTP and CIIRDF respectively, Rothschild said.

"We're blending these programs for a landmark meeting," he added, pointing to an existing trilateral arrangement involving Canada, China and Israel as a model.

"But here, the commercial prospects are near term," he added.

Although it will be up to the participants to determine what projects are priorities, Rothschild offered a hypothetical scenario to illustrate the kind of deal that could benefit all sides. The management of an Indian waste management facility that services millions of users is facing issues of pollution runoff. They would call for solutions within a limited budget that would address water purification issues, given a specific flow.

Israeli and Canadian companies would collaborate on a project to address the Indian case and would apply to ISTP and CIIRDF for grants of up to 50 per cent of the cost of the technology.

"The emerging three-way partnerships will provide Canadian innovators with a competitive advantage in the Indian market, enabling them to seize near-term commercial opportunities and increase the export of Canadian technology to India," Rothschild said.

This week's meeting is meant to assist Indian delegates in providing an overview of the country's water challenges and priorities.

Ontario's Minister of Research and Innovation Glenn Murray is keynote speaker. "As outlined in Ontario's innovation agenda, our government is committed to fostering international partnerships that maximize innovation efforts in strategic areas and deliver value to Ontario-based companies and researchers," he said in a release.

"This three-way R&D collaboration will enable our firms to demonstrate technological leadership in the critical area of water management, capitalize on new opportunities in this emerging economy and contribute to the development of new products with the potential for real global impact," he added.

"We aim to create a resilient innovation ecosystem that connects R&D, higher education and policy to foster sustainable wealth creation in India," said Dr. Rajiv Sharma, head of international co-operation in India's department of science and technology.

"This trilateral initiative will further strengthen this ecosystem by enabling us to draw on the technological know-how of Canada and Israel, and develop new expertise within India. More importantly, the emerging water technologies will help us to build a more sustainable future and preserve the well-being of our citizens," Sharma added.

The idea for the three-way partnership was first raised about a year and a half ago at a bilateral Canada-India meeting on scientific co-operation by Thirumalachari Ramasami, secretary to the government of India, department of science and technology, Rothschild said. "At that meeting he proposed that not only Canada and India be strong partners, but suggested Israel as forming a triumvirate to solve the world's water problems."

The delegates picked Israel because "it's recognized as a world leader in water management and pollution abatement," he said.

Israel recovers two-thirds of its water for re-use, while the best other countries can manage is only in the 20 per cent range, Rothschild noted.

"As a global leader in multidisciplinary R&D and water management, Israel has developed many technology-based water solutions that have enabled us to overcome fresh water shortages," said Dan Vilenski, director on the board of the Israel National Nanotechnology Initiative. "Israel-based innovations in desalination, cloud seeding, drip irrigation, 'fertigation' [applying fertilizer through an irrigation system] and wastewater re-use already provide valuable tools and techniques for countries around the world. This trilateral R&D collaboration will allow us to build on these achievements, put this expertise into greater practice, and develop novel products that address key water issues in India and other developing nations."

Tourism soars in February, approaches record

Irit Rosenblum
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — With more than one million hotel nights, February is shaping up to be Israel's best month for tourism in a decade, approaching the record set in October 1999 on the eve of the second intifadah.

But the 350,000 tourists are maxing out the capacity of the country's hotels and placing incredible stress on service, which is suffering as a result, industry professionals say.

Hotel capacity in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv is approaching 90 per cent. Jerusalem hoteliers are begging their peers in the city to take their overflow, since they're subject to heavy fines if they book rooms for groups they later have no room for. Tour guides and drivers are being sent to sleep at their own homes, not at hotels alongside their groups.

Some tourists are even being sent to sleep in Ashkelon and Be'er Sheva, instead of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

This year, Israel will host more than 3.2 million tourists, said Tourism Minister Stas Misezhnikov at the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) tourism conference in Jerusalem recently.

That's 500,000 more than the country got in 2009. Now that Israel has joined the OECD, which officially makes it a developed country, it's pulling in more tourists.

"The demand shows that we don't have enough hotel rooms and that we're at maximum capacity in peak tourist season," said Oren Drori, head of the ministry's marketing division.

Israel is seeing an increase in tourism from the United States and Russia, as well as from emerging markets such as Brazil, India and South Korea. This includes pilgrims as well as people interested in Israel's culture, he said.

The country is planning to build another 9,000 hotel rooms by 2015, Misezhnikov said.

May and October are peak tourist season in Israel.

It's not the quantity of tourists that matters, but who the tourists are, said the director general of the Israel Incoming Tour Operators Association, Ami Etgar.

October tourists rent out more hotel rooms than summer tourists, many of whom are French Jews who own or rent apartments, he said.

The country doesn't have enough infrastructure to handle the number of tourists here this month, Etgar said.

"The quality of service in October isn't good," he said. "Groups are waiting an hour and a half at Ben-Gurion International Airport, and the Old City of Jerusalem is very crowded."

Chava Rosenfarb's life in fiction

The graves of modern Yiddish writers are scattered across the globe. In the great Jewish cemetery at the western edge of Warsaw, one can visit the elaborate marble tomb atop the burial place of I.L. Peretz. Sholem Aleichem and Joseph Opatoshu were laid to rest in the New Mount Carmel Cemetery in Queens, New York. Isaac Bashevis Singer's grave can be found further afield in New Jersey. This month, the prolific, Lodz-born writer Chava Rosenfarb, most of whose career was spent in Montreal, was buried in the Workers' Circle Cemetery in north Montreal.

Rosenfarb's death this past month marks an end point in the Canadian Yiddish tradition. With the aid of her co-translator and daughter Goldie Morgentaler, Rosenfarb maintained an active career into her ninth decade. Beginning in 2004, the University of Wisconsin Press reintroduced her major work, The Tree of Life (Der Boim fun Lebn). In three volumes, it offers a detailed portrait of prewar Lodz and the Lodz Ghetto. In 1994, Toronto's Cormorant Books brought out a story collection titled Survivors: Seven Short Stories, which includes an array of biting portraits of postwar life in the aftermath of the Holocaust. In recent years, Rosenfarb continued to travel, giving talks on her own work and that of other Yiddish writers, while Morgentaler worked on translations of unpublished work. From a distance one felt that Yiddish literature was still being tended and created anew.

This year, in an online journal devoted to Jewish fiction, Rosenfarb contributed a story titled April 19th, which is of a piece with her other portraits of survivors. A ghost story of sorts, it captures the lives of survivors in postwar Montreal when most of them lived in the vicinity of "de montn" – the Mountain, or Mount Royal – on Esplanade and Jeanne-Mance near an early incarnation of the Montreal Jewish Public Library.

Norman Ravvin

The date in the story's title reflects its setting, a Warsaw Ghetto Uprising commemoration "packed with mourners." Among other things, April 19th evokes an early stage in Holocaust commemoration in Canada. Survivors make up a major part of the audience, at a time when they are young and just beginning as parents themselves; the focus is on the lighting of six symbolic candles; and the focal text, sung by a choir, is by Shmerke Kaczerginski, a poet of the Vilna Ghetto and partisan. (Just as April 19th recalls a largely forgotten wartime lyric, the graveside gathering at Rosenfarb's burial included the singing of the once well-known anthem of the Jewish Polish Bund, Di Shvue (The Oath).

In The Tree of Life, Rosenfarb makes intriguing use of a poet's work to evoke the losses of war. There, it is Simcha Bunim Shayevitsh, whose poem Lekh-Lekho, dedicated to his young daughter, helps Rosenfarb contend, in fiction, with the heartbreak of Jewish families in the ghetto.

With her major work in print and well anthologized, Rosenfarb's place in the Canadian Jewish literary canon is secure. While other major careers, such as those of Rochl Korn, Melech Ravitch and J.I. Segal fade from view, Rosenfarb remains accessible because of the wealth of her work that was translated into English. Her oeuvre operates like a time capsule. Open it and you find the millionaires' mansions of prewar Lodz, the maddening Mordecai Chaim Rumkowski of the ghetto, and intimate portraits of survivors as they remade their lives in postwar cities. April 19th offers an evocative portrait of the edge of Montreal's Mountain not long after the war, when the "lilacs and jasmine were just coming into bloom." One might, this coming spring, take a walk along Esplanade Avenue and see if the trees still flower there as they once did.

Norman Ravvin's new novel is The Joyful Child, from Gaspereau Press. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

DARRAH TEITEL WINS CANADIAN JEWISH PLAYWRITING CONTEST

Darrah Teitel, a graduate of University of Toronto and the National Theatre School of Canada's playwriting program, has won the 2010 Canadian Jewish Playwriting contest for Corpus, a play that grapples with issues of the Holocaust.

Teitel receives a $1,000 prize, and Corpus will be given a professionally directed and acted staged reading in a Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre-Al Green Theatre workshop presentation.

Corpus follows Megan, a PhD candidate, and Heinrich, a squeegee kid in Berlin, as they grapple with the Nazi genocide. Other characters include Eli, a Polish prisoner in Auschwitz, and Eva, the wife of an SS officer. According to a press release from the Miles Nadal JCC, which sponsors the annual playwriting competition, Corpus "illuminates the ethical ambiguity that engulfs people living through devastating times and asks us to question our own relentless fascination with dark history."

Teitel has previously written radio dramas for the CBC and other networks, as well as a play for SummerWorks 2008. She is a past winner of the Calgary Peace Play Prize and In the Beginning Jewish Playwright Competition. Corpus has already been workshopped and presented at University of Calgary, Nightwood Theatre, Banff Centre and Harold Green Jewish Theatre.

Israeli and Canadian Jews clash on stage

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

An Israeli playwright and actor is debuting her first Canadian play in Toronto this March.

A Hamburger in a Pita is written by CJN columnist Nina Shenhav and is being staged by Teatron Theatre. It tells the story of a Canadian Jewish family, the Liebermans, and their Israeli neighbours, the Noys. The two families don't get along and often get into arguments about parking spaces and noise.

The situation gets worse when the Canadian family's son falls in love with the Israeli family's daughter and they decide to move to Israel together.

Nina Shenhav

"It's kind of a soap opera, but on stage," said Shenhav, who came to Canada from Israel almost four years ago.

The idea for the play came from Shenhav observing the cultural differences between her Israeli and Canadian friends, as well as letters she got from people who read her CJN column, suggesting she turn her stories into a play.

"I personally didn't think there was a difference in mentality between Israelis and Americans or Canadians," she said. "But I saw the Israelis feel that the Jewish Canadians look down on them, and the Canadians think that Israelis are aggressive."

In A Hamburger in a Pita, the two families eventually get to know each other while trying to stop their kids from going to Israel, and they realize they have a lot more in common than they originally thought.

"People are people," Shenhav said. "People have the same feelings, the same fears, the same loving. That's my message – just make the effort and try to see the other guy, and you'll see they're quite alike."

Ari Weisberg, Teatron Theatre's artistic director, said "the depiction of the two households, with their differences in mentality, language and attitude, fills this play with many funny situations, while at the same time bringing thought provoking and intimate themes to the forefront."

Shenhav agreed that it's a "very difficult and complicated issue, [but] I really believe that people will leave the theatre with a big smile," she said.

A Hamburger in a Pita runs from March 2 to 13 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. For more information or to purchase tickets, visit www.teatrontheatre.com or call 416-616-5350.

Sascha Cole to play Anne Frank

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

The actor playing the title role in an upcoming production of The Diary of Anne Frank, at the theatre in Central Commerce Collegiate in Toronto, had never read the famous diary until she started rehearsals.

"Most young people read it in school, and I'm a Jewish girl, so I guess people would assume that I read it," Sascha Cole says.

"I always avoided it because I thought it was going to be depressing. I'm pretty sensitive, so I thought why would I want to make myself sad?"

To her surprise, Cole discovered that the diary is more uplifting than she thought. "Anne has a sense of humour, and her veracity towards life is very inspiring," Cole says. "That's what makes her so special because in the face of this, she has a need to survive and find some kind of hope. Anne surprises me all the time. She has such light to her."

Adapted by Wendy Kesselman and produced by Shakespeare in Action, the play tells the compelling story of Anne Frank during the dark days of the Holocaust when the teenager documented her experience.

"The play spans the 25 months that they manage to live in the attic and is told from the point of view of Anne," Cole says. "It is basically a story of a family surviving, but more importantly, it is the coming of age of a very curious, intelligent and precocious young woman."

Sascha Cole

She says the play speaks to her about what it means to survive. "If you compare Anne to her sister – when Margot goes to the attic, you get a sense that she has lost hope, but Anne has such insight. Her thoughts about the world and humanity, despite everything that is happening, is very inspiring.

"She says in the play, taken from her diary, 'I still believe in good, despite everything that has happened.' It makes me think about what it takes to survive and the survivor mentality," Cole says.

"She did die. Once she was taken to the camps, she only lasted seven months. Something about her hope and her ability to see good in people... regardless, really speaks to me. And, makes me feel so thankful for all the blessings in my life and that I live in Toronto, in Canada and not in a country that is at war with another country and I have all of my rights."

The Toronto-based actor is a graduate of the National Theatre School of Canada in Montreal and the British American Drama Academy in Oxford, England. Her credits include The Apology for the Next Stage Festival, Factory Theatre's Bethune Imagined, and CanStage's Rock 'n' Roll.

The Diary of Anne Frank is directed by Michael Kelly, and the cast includes Chris Karczmar and Alexis Koetting as Anne's parents, Otto and Edith. Bruce Beaton and Catherine McNally play Hermann and Auguste Van Daan.

The play runs from March 1 to 13 with school performances beginning Feb. 23 at Central Commerce Theatre, 570 Shaw St. For tickets, call 416-703-4881. For more information, visit www.shakespeareinaction.org.

Everyday people become rock 'n' rollers

Rena Godfrey
Special to the CJN

It's the first snowstorm of the season, but the weather doesn't seem to stop 150 people from coming out to cheer on their friends and family at Toronto's legendary Silver Dollar Room.

Music by the Eagles, Peter Frampton and Bob Seger roars through the crowd. The vibe is electric and the musicians are playing their hearts out, but clearly this isn't any ordinary gig.

The musicians are actually regular folk – marketing executives, lawyers, scientists, architects and bankers – all part of the League of Rock (LOR), an adult rock-music program.

Participants have been gearing up and rehearsing for this big night – the final showcase –since they first joined.

One of the participants, Sue George, 45, is a marketing manager and has been singing in her basement since she was a kid. She didn't know what to expect when she first joined the LOR.

"It's a bit scary for everybody at the beginning, but we quickly became friends. Making music has everything to do with working together, and a big part of the LOR is the whole collaborative effort," George said. "In the end, we became a community, and that's a very powerful thing."

George was very proud of her band, Harmony Road, and the progress they made over the weeks. At the showcase, they played Seven Bridges Home, a classic Eagles' song, featuring a challenging five-part harmony.

Ernie Cavallin, 61, has been playing drums for 41 years.

Founded in 2006 by Terry Moshenberg, the LOR has catered to more than 650 singers and musicians like George and offers them a place in a band, a series of workshops and the chance to record a CD.

Moshenberg started the LOR because he felt that adults, in general, often overlook their own passions and creativity. "We, as parents, foster our kids' interests, by signing them up for hockey, ballet or soccer, and tend to put our needs in a box. Everyone deserves the ability to continually explore and enrich their lives," Moshenberg said.

In addition to the Toronto location, LOR has chapters in Montreal, Ottawa, Vancouver, New York and Chicago.

Many LOR participants are return customers. Kenny McNally was hooked when he joined the LOR two years ago, so much so, that he now works with Moshenberg running the jam sessions in Toronto. He interviews participants before their first day in order to determine the different strengths and talents of the new band members, and then places four to five people in each band. For McNally, the LOR is all about the supportive people he's met, their mutual love of music and the thrill of the live performance.

Another participant, Ernie Cavallin, 61, has been playing drums for 41 years. He fondly describes each of them as a "giant love fest."

He admits that there are some struggles that members encounter, but part of the learning process is being able to work together as a team. In fact, team building for corporations and organizations is another focus of the LOR. That's landed them fifth spot in the Globe and Mail's top 10 list of 2011 Business Junkets. Such companies as Rogers, BlackBerry, Fido, Dell and Scotiabank have sent their people to the LOR for music-based teambuilding and corporate retreat events.

After the final showcase, many LOR participants find themselves asking, "What's next?" LOR alumni often stay in touch with their bandmates, some become good friends, others start new bands together, and there's always a good turnout of alumni at the final showcase.

Justin Bieber has a Jewish road dad

Edmon J. Rodman
JTA

LOS ANGELES — Is Never Say Never, the biographical documentary and concert film that recounts the rise of Justin Bieber, also a message film of "Hear O Israel"?

The film, which opened recently, has a genuine Jewish back story due to the on-screen presence and production involvement of Bieber's Jewish manager, Scott Samuel (Scooter) Braun.

By all accounts Braun, who discovered Bieber on YouTube – a site where the teen sensation now has several songs with more than 100 million views – plays an important role in Bieber's life both on stage and off.

"On the road I take responsibility for him," Braun, 29, told JTA in a recent interview, relating that his Jewish background helps Bieber to maintain a sense of balance.

Off stage, Braun also is a presence – a kind of a Jewish road dad helping the 16-year-old Bieber face the challenges.

"The girls chase the car, they're in the lobby," Braun said. "They know where we're going before we know."

On stage, as reported by various sources, Braun, Bieber and some of the crew members say the Shema before beginning a concert.

"Originally, Justin and the crew just did a prayer circle before the show that ended with Jesus Christ. I wasn't into that," said Braun, who grew up in Greenwich, Conn.

With another Jewish member of the crew, "we started saying the Shema. About the third time, Justin chimed in," Braun recalls. "He had memorized it. Now others say it with us, too.

"When you're about to step out on stage with 10,000 girls screaming, it's good to have faith."

The fact that the Shema, a prayer that is said with "all your heart," has become part of Bieber's ritual in itself represents a change in heart.

In December 2009, the New York Times reported that on meeting Braun, Pattie Mallette, Justin's mother, said, "God, I gave him to you. You could send me a Christian man. A Christian label."

"She's a protective mother," explained Braun when asked about his first encounter with Mallette. "If someone called you up in the middle of the night and wanted to talk to you about taking your child on the road, what would you do?"

The scene with the Shema is in the film because Bieber's mother wanted it there, said Braun.

"Originally, it was left out, and she said that's not what we do," he said.

As noted by Rabbi Jason Miller of Michigan, who writes at blog.rabbijason.com, "Based on the number of concerts at which Justin Bieber performs, I'm guessing that he's actually said the most important statement of Jewish belief many more times in his life than the average 16-year-old Jewish youth."

On April 14, Bieber is scheduled to perform in Israel.

"No matter what, we're going," Braun answered when asked about other performers such as Elvis Costello who have cancelled performances in Israel.

"Patti and Justin are looking forward to visiting Bethlehem," he adds, "and my sister is in med school there."

The Bieber group will be there for the first night of Passover, and Braun plans on having a seder.

"Justin wants to be part of the seder," he said.

March 2-13, 2011

This world première comedy introduces us to two secular Jewish families: the Canadian-born Liebermans and their new Israeli neighbours, the Noys. Differences of mentality and mannerism lead to tension, but when their children fall in love with each other and discover Judaism, the parents find that they have much more in common than they thought.

Maccabi Toronto wins indoor soccer championship

Compiled by CJN Staff

The Maccabi Toronto men's team captured its sixth Downsview Park Adult Soccer League Championship in the last seven seasons, defeating Armour Elite 4-3 in the final at The Hangar.

In what was supposed to be a rebuilding season, the veteran Maccabi team hung on as Armour Elite mounted a last-minute push for the equalizer. Yair Rabinovich employed what is being called "the leg of God" to clear a shot and save a sure goal.

The veteran team consisting of former and current top university players, as well as many players who have represented Canada in the Maccabiah Games, utilized a counter-attacking style of game to thwart Armour's non-stop high-intensity pressure. Armour Elite was last summer's Ontario Soccer League Under 21 Cup Champions.

Tied 1-1 at halftime, Maccabi employed quick ball movement, one-touch soccer, great spacing and efficiency, and scored three goals in the first 10 minutes of the second half.

Gil Vainshtein, a former U.S. college scholarship athlete, scored two, as did Dan Sankar, a former Dartmouth scholarship grad. Both competed for Canada in the 2009 Maccabiah Games along with player/coach Jason Mausberg, Erik Waisman, Yair Rabinovich, and Dave Zbar.

Armour rallied to score two more goals to close the gap to 4-3.

With numerous fans looking on, including boys from the under-nine Maccabi Toronto team, which is leading the Toronto Futsal League, the Maccabi men held on for the victory.

With his two-goal performance, Vainshtein captured the Golden Boot award for leading the league in goals scored.

In other developments, Maccabi Toronto Academy (MTA) has been accepted to compete in the Soccer Academy Alliance Canada against the best athletes in the city of Toronto and the province of Ontario. Players from across the GTA and beyond, with no geographic restrictions, will be eligible for the team.

Games will be Sundays as a result of the league's agreeing to accommodate MTA's request not to schedule Friday and Saturday matches.

Maccabi spokesperson Martin Scott said the move to the Alliance will provide better competition for the Maccabi Academy's athletes. "The best way to get better is against better competition, and we will have that," Scott said.

The Maccabi Academy team will field youngsters born in 2003 and 2002, but if the response is great enough, it will possibly add teams for kids born in 2001 and 2000 as well.

"We are hiring new coaches, getting more and bigger facilities, but need the public's help to find the best Jewish kids that we don't know about in those target years, in particular 2001," Scott said.

For more information, contact Scott at 647-293-6645, or by e-mail at martinemilscott@hotmail.com.

Winnipeg 'Y' snags Joe Montana as keynote speaker

Compiled by CJN Staff

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg "Y" has done it again.

With a reputation for recruiting "A-list" celebrities for many of its previous 38 Sports Dinners, the "Y" this year will feature former NFL great Joe Montana as its keynote speaker.

"We are excited to have Joe Montana speak at the sports dinner," event chair Ken Kronson said in a statement. "His excellence as a player is legendary."

A four-time Super Bowl winner with San Francisco, Montana is a three-time Super Bowl MVP, two-time NFL MVP and five-time all-pro who was elected to the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 2000. He is the all-time NFL leader in quarterback ratings (93.4).

Previous keynote speakers have included Bobby Hull, Peyton Manning, Chris Berman, Scotty Bowman, Mickey Mantle and Cal Ripken, Jr.

The "Y" Sports Dinner is a major fundraiser for the Rady Jewish Community Centre (JCC). This year's event takes place June 21 at the Winnipeg Convention Centre. Last year, more than 1,200 people attended.

Israel hosting cycling events

Compiled by CJN Staff

Israel will play host to two international cycling competitions this spring, showcasing the unique and diverse terrain of the small Mediterranean nation.

The two tours include the Tour de Dead Sea, which begins on March 5 and takes travellers through the moon-like landscape of the lowest point on earth. The Tour de Dead Sea is expected to attract more than 1,000 cyclists from around the world to ride along the contours of the Dead Sea in support of its candidacy as a finalist in the New7Wonders of Nature competition.

Cyclists will be able to choose between 3-, 15-, 27- and 40-mile routes around the Dead Sea region.

The second event is the Tour d'Israel, a country-wide cycling trip that will provide unrivalled views of Israel's diverse landscape with two challenging bicycle courses.

Running March 7-10, the tour's 380-mile on-road race will begin at Mount Hermon in the North and pass through the Galilee region, Nazareth and the Sea of Galilee, Jerusalem, Be'er Sheva, the Jordan Valley, Masada and the Dead Sea with a finish line at the seaside resort town of Eilat on the shores of the Red Sea.

For the more adventurous rider, a 224-mile off-road course will begin in the northern Golan Heights and include a four-mile climb finishing at the southern tip of the Carmel Forest mountain range. The off-road race runs March 30-April 2.

A culinary history of France

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

The cookbook Quiches, Kugels and Couscous by Joan Nathan (Alfred A. Knopf) is a one to read – and it took me a week!

If it was only because Joan Nathan is only someone I knew when we both lived in Israel, I would have read it. If it was only because I like to read kosher cookbooks, I would have read it. To know that Nathan spent her junior year abroad in France and has a master's degree in French literature would also have motivated me to read this book. But besides all of this, as an adult, I learned that my maternal grandfather's ancestors had come from France, so I was particularly excited to read and learn. And read and learn I did!

In addition to 49 fascinating essays – mostly about people – there are146 illustrations and 210 recipes, plus French-Jewish menus, a glossary, a source guide and a bibliography.

Quiches, kugels and couscous are only a very small part of this well-researched work, which is also a personal history plus the culinary history of the Jews in France from 39 CE to today. That's what makes this such an exciting read!

Nathan's introduction tells of her trip to France in the 1950s, her junior year at the Sorbonne and her subsequent and frequent visits to her family there. In writing this cookbook, she explains that she felt "a sense of urgency in trying to recapture [the traditional recipes of the older generation which is dying out] as the people who cooked them remember them, and to explore their origins."

There are 15 appetizers ranging from a 13th-century charoset to a leek terrine from Alsace, and the history of foie gras with several chopped liver recipes.

Tempting soups of Moroccan, Tunisian and Algerian origin are part of the 18 soup recipes, including beet soup mentioned in the Talmud and the universally popular Jewish chicken soup and matzah balls with a French twist.

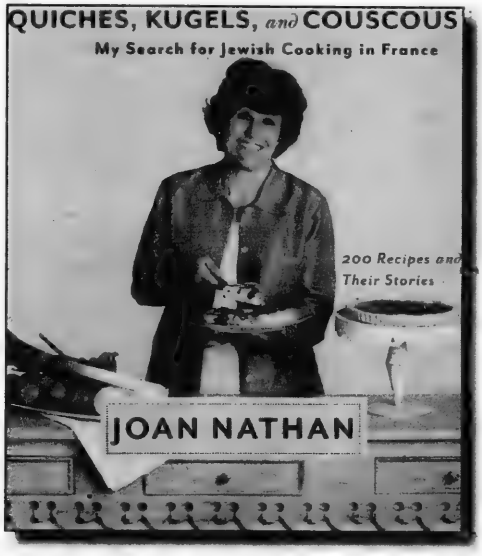
Nineteen hot and cold salads are included, as well as classics like French potato salad and those with beets, fennel, celery root and artichokes.

In the breads chapter, among the 13 recipes are a number for Shabbat, the famous Parisian pletzl (bialy) and other varied breads.

In the fish chapter, 15 fish recipes include French gefilte fish and salmon, carp, fish sauerkraut and more, plus preserved lemons and a horseradish sauce.

In the exciting chicken, duck and goose chapter, incorporated among the 15 recipes are several tagines (the Moroccan dish named after the clay pot in which it is cooked) and cassoulets (overnight Sabbath stews).

The beef, veal and lamb chapter offers several Sabbath stews among the 17 recipes.



Twelve enticing quiches, kugels, omelets, and savoury soufflés comprise a chapter; and there are 10 recipes for grains, pulses, couscous and rice.

The vegetable chapter overflows with 26 recipes including ratatouille, gratins (dishes with a crust of bread crumbs or grated cheese on top), tians (hot or cold dishes made of layered ingredients), the well-known fried artichokes, Jewish style, and potato latkes.

In the desserts chapter are 34 tantalizing recipes with cakes, gateaux (French cakes), tortes (cakes using ground nuts instead of flour), tarts, cookies, macaroons, candies and more.

This is a classic book for Jewish cookbook collectors, Jewish cooks, cooks of eclectic kosher and Jewish cooking and anyone who wants to add French-kosher recipes to his or her repertoire.

Providence, R.I.-born Joan Nathan spent three years in Israel in the 1970s working for the late mayor Teddy Kollek before moving to the United States.

IDF vet volunteers with Toronto Police Auxiliary

Jordan Press
Special to The CJN

Mayer Elharar laughs on the phone. He had no idea his name brings up so much information in an Internet search.

The 27-year-old has a long list of extracurricular activities that come up with a click of a Google search button: Toronto Police Auxiliary member; founder of Hillel at the Glendon campus of York University; Millennium Scholarship winner and co-founder of a non-profit that aims at getting Canadian youth involved in social change. These are just a few of the pieces of information that come up in search results.

Since arriving in Canada from Israel six years ago, Elharar has done his best to get involved in his community in some way.

He wants to give back, he says.

"That's really my main motivator," he says. "I'm very passionate about change, very passionate about making things better. When I see something that needs to be changed, I get involved."

After Elharar finished his Israel Defence Forces military service, he, like many Israelis, planned a long backpacking trip across South America. Elharar and two friends had everything worked out.

While he was planning his trip, he also applied to universities, specifically York University in Toronto.

York accepted him to study business.

Elharar decided to go to school rather than Peru.

He spent his first year at Glendon — York's campus nestled in the ravine between the posh Bridle Path neighbourhood and Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre — becoming comfortable in Canada. By second year, he was involved in campus life, founding the Glendon Entrepreneurial Club and the campus' Hillel branch, which came about after a chance meeting in the campus gym.

An older man approached Elharar in the weight room one day, asking him about the IDF T-shirt he was wearing. The man asked Elharar if he was Israeli and Jewish. Elharar answered yes. Then he asked the next question on his mind: why are you at Glendon? There are no Jews here.

"And it's true," Elharar said.

York's large Jewish population, which attracted Elharar to the school, is mostly on the school's main campus. Glendon's Jewish population is sparse.

In his third year, Elharar and a friend decided to see if anyone would come out for a local Hillel chapter. They postered the campus and ordered two pizzas for the meeting, worried that they would be the only two eating.

"I came over to the room, and I saw a room full of people. I was really astonished," Elharar said. Then he had another thought: "Do we have enough pizza?"

The chapter got involved in campus life. During Holocaust Education Week, the group brought in survivors to speak to students, Elharar said.

For his efforts, Glendon and Hillel Toronto recognized him with awards, the latter group giving him four awards for his efforts to reach Jewish students at the small bilingual campus.

Last year, Elharar graduated from York with a master's degree in economics. Today, he works as a forensic accountant for Soberman Chartered Accountants. He tends to work long hours, but that hasn't dissuaded him from getting involved in his community.

When he first arrived in Canada, Elharar considered places to volunteer. The Toronto Police Service seemed like a logical choice.

"If something's wrong, you call the police… They're the number 1 people you can call and hopefully they'll save the day," he said. "That's where I want to be if I want to help the community as a whole.

"That's one of the main things that made me want to participate in the Toronto police. It's an amazing opportunity for me to help the community where I live and make the streets safer for all of us."

At first, he couldn't find a way to volunteer with the force. Maybe it was his English, he said, but he was politely turned away at the local station. Two years ago, he decided to try again. This time, he walked into police headquarters and strode to the human resources department. Again, he asked about volunteering. This time it was suggested to him to join the auxiliary.

Elharar signed up.

It was a long process that took more than a year, Elharar said, but last year he was officially made a member of the auxiliary. The official graduation ceremony – during which he was presented with an award for finishing at the top of his class – came after his first assignment: assisting police during the G20 summit in Toronto in late June. For the most part, though, Elharar has worked crowd control at events such as the Santa Claus parade.

Mayer Elharar received a master's degree in economics from York University last year.

"It is very interesting work. Most of the things we do are community events," Elharar said. "You feel like you can really help. When you see someone at the end of the day telling you, 'Thank you, officer' – it just makes my day."

Auxiliary police officers are expected to donate 150 hours a year to the force.

While that may keep Elharar busy after long days at the office, he said he is still looking for more to do. While the police keep him connected to the wider Toronto community, Elharar said he wants to do something that would keep him connected to the city's Jewish community, either through an existing program or through a new venture.

Elharar pauses for a moment and begins to talk about the ideas in his head. After just going through a job hunt, Elharar said he thought there must be some way to make it easier. There are a number of successful Jews who likely want to help today's youth land that first job. Maybe there's a way to connect the two, he said.

Elharar hasn't connected the dots, but it's an example of how he views the world: he sees something he feels needs to change, and then he finds a way to make his ideas a reality.

Elharar does find the time to relax, but he'd rather be busy. He'd rather get involved in activities for his community.

"That's just my personality and that's what I like."

Is it worth it?

I come home and bump into Meir. He's all smiles, waiting for me, excited and happy. A small wave of horror overcomes me. "Not tonight" I say. "I'm tired, I have a headache, I had a rough day."

Meir looks at me nodding his head. "Not that, you icy fridge. We're meeting Victoria and Dan tomorrow night!"

The horror wave is getting bigger. Victoria and Dan are a well-off couple who adore us and invite us over from time to time. The official reason for why they dig us is that I'm an actress, and they saw a scene of my show in Israel 10 years ago, when they accidentally turned on their hotel's TV. The real reason? I don't know. Actually, I do: Victoria's in love with my Meir. Every time we come to a private dinner party, it goes like this:

Victoria (opens her flimsy arms): Meir! So good to see you (a scarecrow hug, 10 seconds long). Nina. You came as well? Hi.

Dan: Welcome, guys. So, Nina, what movie are working on, lately?

Me: Um...um...um...

Meir: Nina is considering her options.

Victoria (skeptically): Is she, now? What options? Do tell.

Meir: I tell you, something sure smells great in here!

Victoria (flattered): Oh, Meir, you are so perceptive. Yes, (humbly) I did order us dinner. Tell me, Meir (she examines him), have you been working out?

Dan: Let me show you the latest art we purchased! Do you love Gauguin, Nina?

Me: Ecstatically.

Victoria: Meir, I bet it's genetic to have such dark, luxuriant hair. Are all your siblings that young looking?

Dan: Nina, you'd appreciate this painting (we go to the home art gallery to see Gauguin among his other famous friends). Have you ever played in a movie that deals with great artists?

Me: Um...um...um...

Meir: A beautiful painting, Dan.

Victoria: Have you ever considered having your portrait taken, Meir? Bet it'd be a masterpiece. Such heroic features.

Dan: Would you like some aperitifs before dinner?

Me (happy, as we go through a journey to the living room): Sure!

Victoria: Meir! You chose the exact liquor I would have chosen! We're so much alike!

Dan: Vodka, is it, Nina?

Me: Give it to me straight, Dan.

Victoria: I ordered fresh oysters, Meir. Bet you love licking them...

Meir: You know I can't eat them, Vicki.

Me (Vicki? Vicki?): Victoria! We keep kosher.

Dan: We know. We ordered the finest salmon as well. Shall we?

And so we go to their huge dining room, and all (well, most) of my troubles go away. Love the food. It's like going to this posh, super expensive restaurant. And the desserts? Not that I'm a dessert person, yet it's all worth while. So Victoria is hugging, petting and kissing my husband, but have you ever tried such a brûlé?

As I recall all these things, I'm still standing at the door.

"Oh, well." I sigh. "We might as well. What time do they want us there?"

Meir is a bit less beaming. "Well... I invited them over here this time. Hey, it's only fair. Isn't it?"

CHOCOLATE TRUFFLE COOKIES FOR PURIM

4 squares (1 oz. each) unsweetened chocolate
2 c (12 oz.) semisweet chocolate chips, divided
1/3 c butter
1 c sugar
3 eggs
1 1/2 tsp vanilla extract
1/2 c flour
2 tbls baking cocoa
1/4 tsp baking powder
1/4 tsp salt
Confectioners' sugar

Yield: 4 dozen.

Over medium heat in saucepan, melt unsweetened chocolate, 1 c chocolate chips and butter stirring often; cool 10 min. In mixing bowl, beat sugar and eggs for 2 min. Beat in vanilla and chocolate mixture. Combine flour, cocoa, baking powder and salt; beat into chocolate mixture. Stir in remaining chocolate chips. Cover and chill at least 3 hrs. Remove 1 cup of dough. With lightly floured hands, roll into 1-in. balls. Place on ungreased baking sheets. Bake at 350° 10-12 min. or until lightly puffed and set. Cool in pan 3-4 min. before removing to wire rack to cool completely. Repeat with remaining dough. Dust with confectioners' sugar.

Bar/bat mitzvah in Uganda: we're back

It's encouraging to discover that the bar/bat mitzvah parties are slowly beginning to change. I wrote on this topic about a year ago, but wanted to revisit it because as president of Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, I have found more parents are interested in doing something meaningful for their child's rites of passage. More 12- and 13-year-olds are asking for a weekend of meaning, rather than prancing about the floor dressed up as a teenybopper singing idol.

Some local parents recently approached Ve'ahavta with a desire to do something meaningful and special for their son's bar mitzvah. The mother seemed so relieved at not having to order thousands of dollars in flowers, to fill out table cards for hundreds of people and to work with a caterer. Chicken or beef?

The father, a family doctor, felt similarly and appreciated our idea to co-ordinate a family trip to Uganda to work with our partners helping children with spinal deformities (http://ugandaspinemission.blogspot.com/).

The father will work with a team of physicians at the Mulago Hospital in Kampala to assist dozens of children who need surgery. The rest of the family will be assigned periphery work to help the team.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

While the trip is costly, it will not be as nearly as expensive as a massive party. On top of the families' medical work, they will have a once-in-a-lifetime experience.

Some 100 years ago, a tribal group living in Eastern Uganda was approached by a Christian who wanted to convert them. They asked what it said in the text and learned that Christianity had grown out of Judaism. Interested in converting, they figured they might as well switch over to the "original," so they converted to Judaism. Today, the group, made up of about 600 members, is called the Abayudaya.

While the family from Toronto is in Uganda, they will, together with the Jewish community of Dallas, donate a sefer Torah to the Abayudaya. What a holy journey.

We look forward to the family's departure in August, their reports back, and how their experiences will morph into possibilities for so many other families.

If you have ideas for bar/bat mitzvah celebrations, let me know at avrum@veahavta.org.

Let the community know about them, too. I believe that good ideas for a truly meaningful bar/bat mitzvah will be consumed in droves by the Toronto Jewish community. While I know that many Jews want the fancy-shmancy dinners and parties, I am also convinced that many do not.

The most exciting aspect of this paradigm shift, subtle but real, is that in many ways it is being spearheaded by the bar/bat mitzvot themselves. It reminds us how important it is to respect our young people and listen to what's on their minds. It also encourages us to address the fact that our preteens and young adults don't buy into all of our nonsense. This is enormously important in a money-city such as ours, where we often make the mistake of giving our children an enormous sense of entitlement.

Ask your children what they want for their bar/bat mitzvahs. Explain to them that of utmost importance is the meaning behind the day, the call to the Torah, and their ability to do chesed and enhance the lives of others. Let them know there is far more meaning in Africa than the dance floor of the Sheraton Centre.

United Church to reassess Mideast policies

Leaders visit Israel accompanied by CJC

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Senior leaders of the United Church of Canada spent two weeks touring Israel and the Palestinian territories late last month to reassess the church's official stance on the region and update its policy positions.

The objective of the Feb. 17 to 28 mission, participant Bruce Gregersen said, was "to listen and try to understand the reality of the situation with a central concern about what we might offer as a Canadian church to contribute toward reconciliation.

"A key part of this exploration will include the effectiveness of our past policies and actions and exploration of future policies as a contribution toward ending the occupation of Palestinian territories begun in 1967," according to Rev. Gregersen, lead staff of the church's theology and inter-church interfaith committee and former interfaith officer specializing in Jewish and Muslim relations.

The church's current policy on "Israel-Palestine," instituted at its 40th General Council meeting in Kelowna, B.C., in August 2009, weighs heavily on the pro-Palestinian side.

Policy items include: "[Support for] the full withdrawal of Israeli forces from Gaza…; the withdrawal of Israeli military forces to pre-1967 borders and ending all forms of violence by the Israeli government upon the Palestinian people…; recognition that east Jerusalem, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip constitute an integral part of the territory occupied in 1967 and Israeli settlements in the West Bank and east Jerusalem must be dismantled…; and an end to the illegal occupation of Palestinian territory."

According to mission leader Rev. David Giuliano, a past church moderator, the United Church of Canada's alignment with the Palestinian cause is attributable, at least in part, to the fact that it's natural for the church to partner with Christians abroad.

"Most of the people we've partnered with on projects have been Palestinian, by virtue of their Christianity," said Rev. Giuliano, who is from Windsor, Ont. "A lot of people feel we're critical of Israel, and sometimes we're accused of not visiting the people we should."

United Church of Canada Moderator Mardi Tindal, right, met Gilad Schalit's parents, Noam (not pictured) and Aviva, left, while in Jerusalem. Tindal stopped at the tent outside the prime minister's residence that the couple has erected as part of their campaign to obtain support for the release of their son, who has been a captive of Hamas in Gaza since June 2006. CJC CEO Bernie Farber is beside Tindal.

The mission's aim was to bring balance to the church's relations in the region, and the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) planned three days of the group's 12-day itinerary in Israel.

"Until now, [church members] have heard literally one story," said Bernie Farber, Congress CEO, who went on the mission. "Their trips were planned by Palestinian Christians. We wanted them to see Israel both through Israeli eyes and through Canadian Jewish eyes."

Congress took the mission on tours of the Supreme Court, the Knesset, the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum, Jerusalem's Old City and Maale Adumim in the West Bank. It also arranged briefings with officials at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and meetings with Likud MK Yuli Edelstein, Palestinian Jerusalem Post journalist Khaled Abu Toameh, McGill University history professor Gil Troy, the director of the American Jewish Committee's department for interreligious affairs, David Rosen, Ha'aretz editor Aluf Benn and former senior Arab Affairs adviser to the mayor of Jerusalem, Avi Melamed.

JNF To Fete Melnick

WINNIPEG — Manitoba Minister of Water Stewardship Christine Melnick is being honoured at this year's Negev Gala to be held May 31 in Winnipeg, the Jewish National Fund of Canada's Manitoba chapter said last week. Melnick was instrumental in creating the Manitoba-Israel Water Experts Symposium, a partnership between JNF and the province. Held in Manitoba in August 2008, it brought together water scientists to exchange information and established long-term relationships for water stewardship. A second symposium was held in Israel in January 2010.

WORLD

Demjanjuk Protests

MUNICH — Accused Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk said he'll start a hunger strike next week unless new evidence is introduced in his trial in Germany. On Feb. 22, the day slated for final arguments in his 16-month trial, Demjanjuk demanded that new material be introduced as evidence. A former Ohio autoworker, Demjanjuk, 90, is charged as an accessory to the murder of 29,700 Jews at the Sobibor death camp in Poland in 1943. His lawyer, who says Demjanjuk was forced by the Nazis to train as an SS guard, read a statement in which Demjanjuk said he's the victim of a "political show trial." A Ukrainian native, he immigrated to the United States after the war and lived in suburban Cleveland. He was later stripped of his citizenship for lying about his Nazi past. A death sentence was overturned in Israel after the Supreme Court found reasonable doubt he was a guard at the Treblinka death camp. In May 2009, he was deported to Germany, to stand trial on the Sobibor charges.

Israelis Feared Dead

WELLINGTON — Up to four Israelis who were in Christchurch, New Zealand, when an earthquake struck were missing last week and feared dead. On Feb. 23, Israel's consul to New Zealand, Teddy Poplinger, said his staff is working to contact the 150 Israelis reported to be in the quake region. Israeli backpacker Ofer Mizrahi, 23, was among 75 confirmed killed in the Feb. 22 quake, which measured 6.3 on the Richter scale and devastated Christchurch. Some 300 people were listed as missing, and many were known to be trapped in buildings. The city's Chabad centre was destroyed. Hundreds of Israelis go to New Zealand every year. Israel offered food and medicine, and Magen David Adom was assessing whether to send rescue personnel.

Merger Approved

SAN FRANCISCO — The two organizational arms of the Reconstructionist movement are set to merge. After more than a year of talks, the boards of the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College and the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation voted to form one body to administer Reconstructionist Judaism in North America. Leaders say the merger will permit better use of resources and let the movement focus more effectively on its main concerns: education, movement services and social justice. The federation represents 105 congregations. The college is the movement's sole rabbinical seminary. The proposal will be voted at an April 10 meeting in Philadelphia.

Emanuel Is First Jewish Mayor of Chicago

CHICAGO —Former White House Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel was elected mayor of Chicago.

Rahm Emanuel

Emanuel garnered 55 per cent of the vote in a five-way race Feb. 22, becoming the city's first Jewish mayor. The election was the first time in 20 years that incumbent Richard Daley didn't appear on the ballot. Because Emanuel received more than 50 per cent of the vote, there's no need for a runoff election in April.

Emanuel, 51, resigned in October 2010 as U.S. President Barack Obama's chief of staff to run for mayor. He also worked in the Clinton White House and is a former congressman from Chicago's North Side. A Hebrew speaker, he's the son of an Israeli doctor who moved to the United States in the 1950s.

Emanuel faced a residency challenge in the campaign because he hadn't lived in Chicago for a full year before the vote. Illinois' Supreme Court upheld his candidacy.

Israel must 'sit tight and watch'

Egyptian turmoil likely not an immediate threat, official says

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

An Egypt in turmoil is not the immediate threat to Israel that some might think, according to Raanan Gissin, who once served as former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon's senior adviser.

"The [worry that] the Muslim Brotherhood will assume power, that there will be a radical Islamic regime that will violate the peace process and send [Egyptian military] forces into the Sinai and the next day there's a renewed war [with Israel] is not the case," he told The CJN while in Toronto on a recent speaking tour of North America.

There remain many internal issues for the Egyptian government and army to resolve, mainly rampant poverty and hunger, said Gissin, currently a spokesperson for the Israeli Foreign Ministry on terrorism and security issues.

"In non-democratic regimes in the Middle East, the army usually does the job of playing a responsible [social] role. And the Egyptian army, by law, is the force that protects 'democracy.' It sounds weird or paradoxical... but that's the way it works in modern Egypt," he added.

Egypt's army will likely ensure that in the transition to a new government, the country remains calm and orderly, and it would prevent radical groups such as the Muslim Brotherhood from exploiting the situation until elections in September.

"The army will have to ensure that the voting will be done by ballots and not by bullets."

Despite this, Gissin said there is a potential threat to Israel from "inadvertent escalation" of domestic chaos in Egypt.

If the transition to a new government doesn't go smoothly and protests flare up again, Egypt could come to "a screeching halt" he said.

A crippled domestic infrastructure that can't get food to market or operate ports would create havoc. And it's the army that controls these essential services when necessary.

Gissin offered a second possible scenario: a weak fledgling government takes hold in Egypt after the election and turns "a blind eye" to terrorist activity against the Jewish state in order to keep peace on the streets of Cairo.

"We saw this in Lebanon, when Hezbollah entered the government. Egypt's new government could do the same, relaxing its presence in the Sinai and along the border with Gaza," he said.

Sharansky's anniversary

In his column in The CJN last week, Gil Troy wrote about Natan Sharansky. Ever the historian, Troy used the occasion of the 25th anniversary of Sharansky's release from the Soviet gulag and his triumphant arrival in Israel to write about the diminutive giant who is now the chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Troy called Sharansky "one of the Jewish world's few iconic figures." He is a "Zionist pop star," Troy wrote.

Sharansky is highly respected and celebrated even, if not especially, among university-age youngsters, none of whom had been born when Sharansky zigged and zagged his defiant way to freedom on the Glienicke Bridge to West Berlin Feb. 11, 1986.

From the editor's desk...

Indeed, Sharansky has made meeting with and speaking to university students something of a personal cause. He has visited and spoken at more than 70 university campuses in North America and Europe. He connects immediately and uniquely with his young audience.

Sharansky is a dreamer, a builder and a shaper of history. The students detect this when they meet with him. They like his modest manner and his understated, though confident sense of self.

But they would not like him for his style if they did not first like him for his substance. Sharansky delivers serious, weighty messages. And when he speaks, he speaks from the memory bank of his own vivid and very real experiences – without notes. He inspires.

The 25th anniversary of his release from Soviet prison and settling in Israel is an exceptional moment in modern general and Jewish history. It is worthy of commemoration. Much like on a stop at a reflecting pond, looking at the details of Sharansky's life we might see the shape and contours of ours more clearly.

As head of the Jewish Agency, Sharansky is trying to find ways to bridge gaps and reconcile differences among the different communities that comprise the Jewish people. He is trying to preserve our collective sense of mutual responsibility and collective belonging.

On the Perspectives page in this edition, we have published a recent interview he gave to Ha'aretz. It is dedicated entirely to the current difficult challenges surrounding the controversies arising from the Israeli rabbinate's policies on conversion.

The following remark from that interview poignantly illustrates Sharansky's approach to the idea of the collectivity of the Jewish people.

"It's so important that a person who undergoes conversion according to the tradition of his community and who the community accepts as a Jew be eligible to make aliyah under the Law of Return." (My emphasis)

As most of us know, Sharansky was arrested in March 1977 and charged with spying for the CIA. After a phoney, farcical trial some 16 months later in July 1978, he was convicted of treason and spying for the United States and sentenced to 13 years of forced labour. He spent the first16 months of his sentence in Lefortovo prison and was then sent to a Siberian labour camp.

Sharansky was set free nine years later in 1986 by then-Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev after unceasing, intense advocacy and clamouring in the West for his release.

Two years after his arrival in Israel, Sharansky wrote Fear No Evil (Random House Inc.), in which he eloquently and quite movingly recalls his horrific ordeal in the Soviet justice system.

Many books have been written about Sharansky. The most distinguished perhaps is by Sir Martin Gilbert. Sharansky himself has written two seminal works on democracy and Jewish identity and countless stirring articles. He is an exciting thinker and writer.

After the court pronounced its judgment on July 14, 1978, Sharansky delivered a final statement that is regarded by historians, scholars and human rights activists as one of the shining testaments of the human spirit's infinite ability to rise, even at the moment of low despair and degradation. It was pithy, to the point and piercing of the heart.

The following is a very brief excerpt from that statement as it appears in Fear No Evil.

"For 2,000 years, the Jewish People, my people, have been dispersed all over the world and seemingly deprived of any hope of returning. But still each year Jews have stubbornly and apparently without reason said to each other, Leshanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim (Next year in Jerusalem). And today, when I am further than ever from my dream, from my people, and from my Avital, and when many difficult years of prisons and camps lie ahead of me, I say to my wife and to my people, Leshanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim.

"And to the court, which has only to read a sentence that was prepared long ago – to you I have nothing to say."

Happy 25th anniversary Natan Sharansky. We all celebrate the day.

–MBD

PERES GREETS MINERS

Israel's President Shimon Peres last week received 24 of the 33 Chilean coal miners rescued from their 69-day ordeal last October in the San José copper-gold mine in the Atacama Desert near Copiapó. The miners and their families were on a weeklong visit to Israel. While in Jerusalem, they visited the Kotel, the Old City, the Knesset, Yad Vashem, and several churches. They also visited the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, Masada, Nazareth, Tiberias, Tel Aviv and Jaffa.

GTA shuls raise funds for therapy program

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Members of the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill are preparing to host a group of former Israeli soldiers in May as part of an Israel-based program for people who suffer from Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD).

Linoy Hazan, a Canadian volunteer with the Peace of Mind (POM) program of the Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICPT) in Jerusalem, said she is proud to be involved with an organization that benefits both the discharged Israeli soldiers who participate in the therapeutic, week-long retreat, and the Jewish communities that host them.

Linoy Hazan

Hazan, POM's co-ordinating director here, explained that since 1989, the Israel Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP) has been working to treat the estimated nine per cent of Israelis who suffer from PTSD – three times the level of that in most western countries.

Four years ago, following the Second Lebanon War, ICTP's founding director Danny Brom established a three-month workshop to treat Israel Defence Forces combat soldiers who were exposed to trauma during their army service.

"Because of the Israeli mentality that you have to be macho and strong, no one will ever tell you they need therapy, or will seek therapy," said Hazan, 30, a former Israeli. "When the soldiers come out of it, they're just thrown into normal life, when in fact, their lives are not normal anymore after what they've seen."

When Brom approached the IDF with the idea of evaluating soldiers following their three-year army service, they agreed to refer combat units to take part in the program.

"These specialized combat units undergo an intense three-month healing process, and out of those 90 days, a week of therapy is done abroad," Hazan said.

"The goal of the trips abroad is to get them away from the triggers in Israel and [have them] showered with love and admiration from the Jewish community in Diaspora."

Last October, Chabad Flamingo was the first Canadian synagogue to host a group – 15 soldiers, who still serve as IDF reservists, and two therapists. Until then, POM soldiers were hosted only by shuls in Europe.

Hazan, who works with the Israeli congregation at the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre, is bringing a second group to Toronto in May. She hopes this is the start of an ongoing relationship between Toronto's Jewish community and POM. Several Toronto congregations have expressed interest in hosting future groups.

"The host shuls organize a Shabbaton in the group's honour, and members of the congregation provide them with a place to sleep... Schools invite them to meet with students, [and] other families might host them for dinners," Hazan said, adding that the soldiers also take field trips to Niagara Falls and Toronto tourist sites such as the CN Tower.

The last group was treated by Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment chair Larry Tanenbaum to a Toronto Maple Leafs game, and Hazan said he promised to treat the next group to a game as well.

The $55,000 it costs to bring the soldiers to Toronto covers the round-trip flights, therapy fees, local transportation, field trips and meals.

ICPT, which operates out of the Herzog Hospital Latner Institute, is not a government-funded program. Hazan said they worked to raise $37,000 from private donors to bring in the next group, leaving members of the host shul to come up with $18,000. "People just opened their hearts and pockets for this," she said.

In addition to spending time with the community and seeing the sights, the group also has to undergo 32 hours of therapy throughout the week to deal with their PTSD.

"Combat units are exposed to the most trauma... For example, the unit that was here in October, they were the engineering unit that was responsible for bombing the houses that had explosives in them, and one of their members was hurt. They also had to transport dead bodies," Hazan said.

She said a program like this is an opportunity for Diaspora Jews to show their appreciation to Israelis who sacrifice their safety and well-being to preserve a Jewish homeland.

"Because of them, we are able to live here in peace because we have a land that is protected by them," she said.

Hazan said that when the Chabad Flamingo congregation hosted the group last year, they were so hospitable and welcoming that one of the Israelis asked her, "What's the catch?"

"It literally brought me to tears because Israelis aren't used to this kind of hospitality. It's always give and take and they're always looking for an ulterior motive. We told him, 'There is no catch, just enjoy.' And he said, 'But why? It is our duty to do this.'"

To raise funds for the groups scheduled to come to Toronto later in the year, Hazan is planning a bowl-with-a-soldier event in May and is working on selling Peace of Mind ribbons at Jewish day schools.

Ordinary Palestinians must demand talks

Many people, including Israeli President Shimon Peres, have suggested that Israel take advantage of the strange and surprising waves of mass upheaval in the Arab world to strike a deal with the Palestinians. It is a pressing moment to be seized immediately, they urge.

The suggestion is seductive and has a certain logic. However, much like the cliché, it takes two to make a deal. And the Palestinian Authority, it must be reminded, has steadfastly refused to negotiate unless and until Israel ceases all construction in the West Bank and east Jerusalem. Merely to have the PA's negotiators enter the same room with Israeli negotiators, Israel must first acquiesce to the PA's ultimatum.

The construction issue is a well-documented pretext. It became a precondition for peace talks only after Benjamin Netanyahu became prime minister of Israel, and, more to the point, after Barack Obama became president of the United States. But set that aside for the moment. Set aside as well the many interrelated legal, moral and pragmatic aspects of the issue.

How – we must ask – can Israel be expected as well to set aside the danger inherent in unilaterally surrendering to the PA ultimatum? What would the PA's next ultimatum be? And why – it must be constantly asked – should the West Bank be Judenrein, as the PA has demanded? Why should Jews not be allowed to live there? Why should Israel agree to this brazenly bigoted, racist demand?

The United Nations Security Council resolution two weeks ago condemning Israeli settlements in the West Bank was orchestrated by the PA. It was the latest evidence that the PA has no intention of negotiating a peace treaty with Israel. Its leaders are intent on exploiting every tactic of diverting attention away from direct negotiations with Israel.

That the United States vetoed the resolution served only to raise the value of PA currency in the eyes of the "Arab street." After all, PA President Mahmoud Abbas withstood the personal pleading by both Obama and U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to forgo the resolution. He scoffed at the Americans and went out of his way to make sure everyone knew. The "streets" in Ramallah, Jenin and Jericho were surely pleased. He had proved his tough mettle. Or so it is assumed. But, as we are seeing every day, the Arab streets are proving somewhat less predictable and less manipulatable than they once were. The "streets" are demanding a measure of accountability from their despotic rulers that they never have before.

Ordinary Palestinians must demand that their leaders talk face to face with Israel. They are sufficiently familiar with their Israeli neigbours to know that without direct negotiations, there will be never be an independent state of Palestine.

Retired Cleveland autoworker John Demjanjuk arrived in Israel after being deported from the United States to face charges of allegedly sending thousands of Jews to their deaths as the notorious guard Ivan the Terrible at the Treblinka death camp in Nazi-occupied Poland. He was eventually acquitted by Israel's Supreme Court.

Column widens chasm between Jews

In her column "We shouldn't be smug when looking south" (Feb. 10), Jean M. Gerber laments the vitriolic language that plagues U.S. politics and goes on to say that "Judaism teaches that when we give words to thoughts that are destructive of another, we are destroying that person's life as sure as if we pulled a gun." How then can we explain Gerber's attack on Israel's haredi community, including the former Sephardi Chief Rabbi Ovadia Yosef?

Not content to label Israel's haredi rabbis as ignorant – suggesting they "demonstrate... [their]... ignorance of a tradition they profess to protect," Gerber invokes the word Nazism to describe "these people." To her minimal credit, Gerber does write that she's "not saying that this way of thinking is similar to Nazism," but then she doesn't exactly define how it is dissimilar. If it is not akin to Nazism, why make the comparison in the first place? How is this different from the "poisonous" language of U.S. politics that Gerber bemoans? Have we not learned from the lessons of our past, when anti-Rabin activists portrayed that former prime minister as a Nazi?

I challenge CJN writers to rise above petty clanism that all too often characterizes the various sects of Judaism and create a forum for enlightened, intelligent dialogue. Columns like Gerber's will do nothing to narrow the chasm that exists between the members of klal Yisrael.

Article misses the real issues

The article "CJC seeks 'shalom bayit' between rabbi, Kulanu" (Feb. 24) indicates that Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber claims to be working to bring peace between myself and Kulanu, a group representing gay and lesbian Jews. That's most surprising as I've yet to hear anything from him in this regard. Furthermore, Justine Apple, Kulanu's executive director, is on record as saying that Farber has been "very supportive" of her attack on me. York Regional Police officials have also acknowledged that both Farber and CJC Ontario regional director, Len Rudner, were "involved." If he now intends to become a "peacemaker," perhaps he should have contacted me before announcing it in The CJN.

Moreover, the article misses the real issues. Should Jewish organizations orchestrate police investigations against rabbis? Should Jewish organizations divide the community by attempting to use government coercion to squelch freedom of expression and religion? How will these organizations build broad-based communal coalitions to face critical challenges when they are stifling the freedoms of a major segment of the community? Will rabbis now have to fear speaking out on crucial communal issues?

Hate speech alone rarely kills

Columnist Jean M. Gerber compares the hate-filled rhetoric that led up to the recent Tucson massacre with the equally hate-filled utterances that emanate from the lips of right-wing Jewish extremists like Rabbi Ovadia Yosef ("We shouldn't be smug when looking south," Feb. 10). But hate speech alone rarely kills, unless it is linked to fearsome firepower. Indeed, the disproportionate arming of many Israeli settlers, many of whom are from the United States and Russia, may also make it impossible for the Israeli army to carry out the evacuation of diehards once a peace deal does arrive.

We can't let conversion crisis alienate Diaspora Jews

Natan Sharansky, the chair of the Jewish Agency, is a key player in attempts to forge a compromise regarding conversions in Israel and recognizing the Judaism of people around the world who seek to live here under the Law of Return.

In a recent interview with Jonathan Lis of Ha'aretz, Sharansky said he wants the Jewish Agency to serve as an alternative to the rabbis elsewhere in the world who help the Chief Rabbinate decide if someone is entitled to immigrate under the Law of Return.

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Lis: Do Jews in different parts of the world feel that the arguments in Israel over conversions are alienating – an alienation to their Judaism caused by the state?

Sharansky: There are so many different aspects to the subject of conversion, and I've been dealing with them for many years. This means that I'm involved in many discussions with communities abroad. Our challenge today is, on the one hand, to provide a single criterion to Israeli society that defines a person who is joining the Jewish faith, in a way that will be acceptable to all parts of the Jewish people. On the other hand, the State of Israel has to give every Jew in the world the feeling that Israel is a Jewish state that belongs to him – that it doesn't reject him or consider him second class.

This mission is in no way simple, and because of it there have been a great number of clashes and arguments in recent years. I still think that the proposal by the Neeman Committee on conversions in Israel was the best.

Unfortunately, even though we got the proposal passed in the Knesset and an institute for conversions was established in 1998, the Chief Rabbinate, on one side, and others were not enthusiastic and didn't support it with all their might.

Lis: And what about the Law of Return? Are the arguments about accepting conversions done in the rest of the world making it hard for Jews who wish to immigrate to Israel under this law?

Sharansky: I want to separate the argument about conversion from the recognition of Judaism for the sake of citizenship – eligibility under the Law of Return. It's so important that a person who undergoes conversion according to the tradition of his community and who the community accepts as a Jew be eligible to make aliyah under the Law of Return. From time to time problems have come up on this subject, especially in cases of Reform or Conservative conversions.

Now, problems have also started cropping up in cases of Orthodox conversions. It turned out that in cases of Orthodox conversion, the Interior Ministry would contact the Chief Rabbinate and turn to various Orthodox bodies to consider the person's Judaism. It turned out that sometimes these bodies would be influenced by political considerations, for example, if the community's rabbi was accepted or not. And the answers were given on that basis, even though the information was in no way connected with eligibility to make aliyah.

Lis: How can the Jewish Agency fit in regarding aid to Jews in the various communities? Is it possible to make things easier for people who wish to immigrate under the Law of Return?

Sharansky: The question of whether a person is Jewish or not is a question that has to be asked of the rabbinate and the government. But the question of whether a person is eligible to make aliyah – that's our job. We can help everyone who hasn't gotten permission yet, for irrelevant reasons, if we can confirm that the conversion is acceptable to the community where he lives.

Lis: What do you plan to do to get things moving in that direction?

Sharansky: We'll advise the government to instruct the Interior Ministry to turn to us instead of the Chief Rabbinate to check a person's Judaism with this or that rabbi abroad. As it is, our emissaries make contact with Jewish communities in different parts of the world and open files for people who want to make aliyah. That means that we can inform the Interior Ministry that the community in which the conversion took place is indeed a normative community. We're talking about matters of aliyah and not about the question of who is a Jew.

Lis: What chance is there that an initiative of this kind will be accepted?

Sharansky: I plan to appeal to the prime minister and the Interior Ministry about this. [Sharansky was to speak with the prime minister last week.] In general, we've been able to co-operate well over the years with the Interior Ministry about the eligibility of immigrants to come and live in Israel.

The problems with Orthodox conversions have appeared now for the first time. We're talking about four cases at this stage, but the precedent here is important because this problem is likely to spread. I hope we won't have political arguments… It's no secret that there are many differences of opinion in the Orthodox world between organizations and people. In no way must we allow this subject to harm the various communities.

Lis: In your opinion, is it possible to reach a compromise on conversions in Israel?

Sharansky: The conversion bill proposed by Yisrael Beiteinu MK David Rotem that simplifies the process and allows city rabbis who are considered moderate to carry out the process was frozen for six months. And you were part of the initiative that made it possible to freeze it.

At the moment there is an understanding that the status quo on conversions will continue. The ceasefire will continue for another half year. During this period it was agreed that there will be no attempts to change the existing situation through legislation in the Knesset by MKs or an appeal by the various organizations to the High Court of Justice.

During this time, the government and the Jewish Agency will hold a roundtable conference where the various claims on the subject will be raised. For the first time, we'll bring requests and complaints from the Reform movement to a joint discussion. I hope we'll be able to improve the atmosphere in anticipation of reviving the Rotem bill so it will be phrased in language that is acceptable to everyone. Rotem's idea about the rabbis in the cities was good. But the amendments that were introduced by the various political parties made it problematic.

'We are in danger,' Sharansky says

This is an excerpt from the acceptance speech Natan Sharansky made in Jerusalem on June 25, 2009, when he became chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Many years ago in Moscow, when we were ordinary loyal Soviet Jews… deprived of our freedom and our identity, powerless and helpless… we discovered there is the State of Israel, which fights for its right to exist and also for our dignity, a state which is waiting for us.

Then we discovered that there is a great history, which started with Exodus of the Jews from Egypt… Then we discovered that we are a part of great people whose solidarity, whose struggle will be always with us…

I was in solitary confinement, and near me in the other cell was another prisoner of Zion, Yosef Mendelevitz, also in solitary confinement. We couldn't talk to one another, but we could signal in Morse code.

On what we believed was Independence Day in Israel… we stood still together and looked in the direction of Jerusalem… We knew that the whole Jewish world was united in the struggle [for our freedom]…

Today we are in a different world with different challenges. We are in, what I call, the world of post-identity. Today, for many people in the free world, any connection to their religion, to their people, their roots or their history seems like something which goes against the principles of freedom. In this world of post identity, we Jews are especially in danger because of assimilation and the weakening of the connection to our roots and to our tradition.

Now let's go back to that moment in Soviet prison…

I stood silent in honour of Israel's Independence Day, I felt such a close connection with all the Jews of the world. I have to say that I remember that moment, often nowadays, especially when I travel to campuses… a place where our youth is under constant pressure to be ashamed of and distanced from their people and their country.

The first question I was asked by a young, talented Jewish student on the very first campus I visited – a question repeated again and again – was: "Explain to me why we need Israel. Tikkun olam means justice for everybody. So let us work for justice for everybody."

I told him: "Ask your parents how the world looked when there was no Israel."

We [in the Soviet Union] went back to our roots, back to our identity to fight for our freedom. And in this way we helped fight for freedom all over the world.

The most important challenge for all of us is to make sure that this student at Columbia University or that student at [University of California] Berkeley or a young couple in Sderot or Jews of Venezuela or Kiev, all feel empowered by this connection to the Land of Israel, to the State of Israel, by connection to Jerusalem, by pride for our history and for our tradition.

In this post-identity world, if there are strong, vibrant Jewish families united around Jerusalem and the State of Israel, then our lives will be meaningful and we will be able to fulfil the mission for which we are chosen as a people: to do tikkun olam, to make our world a better place.

Chief-of-staff fiasco badly tarnishes Barak

Ehud Barak, Israel's defence minister, can't seem to get anything right lately.

That wouldn't be terribly distressing if the former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff and Labor Party prime minister was only affecting political matters, but his actions influence Israel's security.

With Barak at its helm, Labor, a party central to so much of Israel's history, is on the verge of disappearing. According to recent polls, if elections were held today, the party would win only six of the Knesset's 120 seats. Compare that to Yitzhak Rabin's 1992 success, when he and Labor won 44 seats.

Party supporters, therefore, breathed a sigh of relief when Barak and four other MKs bolted Labor in mid-January. In a secret ploy orchestrated by Barak and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, reminding some of their bygone days together in Sayeret Matkal, the IDF's elite special operations unit, Barak established a new faction, euphemistically named Atzmaut (Independence).

While this manoeuvre may give Netanyahu some coalition quiet and prolong his government's term, it's been portrayed cynically as Barak's lifeline, providing him independence from Labor and its incessant internal strife. It's also afforded Barak's detractors plenty of schadenfreude. Polls suggest Barak and Atzmaut won't reach the threshold number of votes required to win a seat in the Knesset.

Of more concern is Barak's performance as defence minister.

Two adjacent 15-storey towers in Tel Aviv house the Defence Ministry and IDF headquarters. Only the 14th floors of each, respectively housing the minister's and chief of staff's offices, are connected.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

The defence minister oversees many facets of Israel's immense security apparatus – most significantly the IDF. Among other things, he chooses the chief of staff, approves all high-ranking IDF appointments, fights for the military's share of the national budget and gives prior consent to the most sensitive military operations.

This requires co-operation and coordination between the minister and chief of staff. Hence the literal and figurative 14th-floor bridge between their two offices, ensuring decisions relating to the most sensitive military matters are made by elected politicians and not generals.

Barak and outgoing chief of staff Lieut.-Gen Gabi Ashkenazi didn't work well together. Ashkenazi was brought back from retirement to become chief-of-staff four years ago, in the wake of his predecessor's early departure due to criticism of his handling of the Second Lebanon War. Ashkenazi increased training schedules for ground forces, preparing them for battle in all possible theatres, and oversaw many operations, both clandestine and publicly known, the most noteworthy being operation Cast Lead, in Gaza, in 2009. He's highly respected both inside and outside the military.

Barak was less favourably impressed with Ashkenazi. Last summer, when it was suggested the latter's tenure be extended to a fifth year, Barak nixed the idea. It soon became clear the two weren't on speaking terms. If the matter wasn't serious and Israel was in more amenable surroundings during less turbulent times, what ensued might have actually been entertaining – a real soap opera.

In a nutshell, Barak wanted Yoav Galant, head of the Southern Command, as chief of staff. Ashkenazi didn't and secretly held a document, later found to be forged by someone considered close to him, purporting Galant was using a PR firm to promote his own candidacy.

Barak pushed Galant's appointment and had it approved by the government. Later, when evidence surfaced suggesting Galant had lied in an affidavit signed during legal proceedings between him and some neighbors, his appointment was challenged in court.

Just 10 days before Ashkenazi was to leave office, it became clear Galant's selection wouldn't hold water. Barak refused to swallow his pride and lengthen Ashkenazi's term for a few months until a replacement could be properly appointed. Instead, he publicly insinuated Ashkenazi was not ethically, normatively and professionally worthy, and hastily selected Benny Gantz, a former deputy chief of staff, who took on the hefty assignment Feb. 14.

This saga has raised concerns about Barak's leadership and judgment. If Ashkenazi was as bad as Barak said he was, wasn't it irresponsible of Barak to allow him to keep his highly influential job for as long as he did.

Barak has become a political liability, and his previously solid defence persona has been damaged. If nothing unforeseen happens – like his joining Likud – his political career should end with the present Knesset's dissolution.

Good luck Lieut-Gen. Gantz!

Power and gravity in post-Mubarak Egypt

In the realm of politics, the role of power can be compared to the law of gravity in physics, and ignoring the power struggle in Egypt is like defying gravity while standing on the ledge of a skyscraper.

Therefore, while demonstrators in Cairo's Tahrir (Liberation) Square chanted in support of freedom, they're unlikely to take power and turn Egypt into a democracy. One can imagine an open society with leaders focused on ending the extreme poverty, but imagination and hope are rarely transformed into political reality. In the Middle East, as demonstrated by Iran, power still comes out of the barrel of a gun and through mob violence in the streets.

Egypt is not Iran, and the differences are important. Since 1952, Egypt has been ruled by a wealthy and corrupt military dictatorship, backed by very powerful secret police. The volcanic explosion that we saw in the centre of Cairo was the much-delayed reaction to 60 years of this mis-rule, and it was triggered by a similar situation and response in Tunisia.

For now, after pacifying the demonstrators by evicting president Hosni Mubarak, the military elite remains in control of Egypt and is attempting to reassert its power. But their rule has been shaken and will continue to be challenged, particularly by the Muslim Brotherhood, which is the only organized opposition force in Egypt. If the Iranian precedent is repeated, this fundamentalist Islamist organization (Sunni rather than Shia) will emerge as the dominant force.

This scenario, which is the opposite of the enticing democratic dream, would be a major danger for the world, the Middle East and for Israel. The Muslim Brotherhood provided the foundation for the creation of Hamas, and if they take power in Egypt, increased terror is likely to follow.

But the military regime is unlikely to disappear quickly – they have a much wider base than was the case in Iran, with at least three million people in powerful positions, all of whom have too much to lose in a real revolution.

Instead, look for a coalition involving the post-Mubarak military leadership and the Islamists, possibly led by Amr Moussa. An intense nationalist, Moussa headed the regime's hard-core Nasserist faction and exercised power as Mubarak's foreign minister for many years. When Moussa's anti-Israel ideology created too much friction, the Bush administration in Washington pressed for his removal, and he became head of the Arab League. From there, he has accelerated the "soft power" war against Israel and taken the "cold peace" into the deep freeze. The Arab League funded the notorious Goldstone report, which, in alliance with Human Rights Watch and similar groups, produced the false accusations of Israeli war crimes in the Gaza war.

A coalition between secular nationalists and Islamists would focus on rebuilding Egypt's strength in the region, and hostility toward Israel would be the least common denominator between them. To consolidate his leadership and turn public attention away from continued corruption and economic failure, Moussa's confrontational approach can be expected to grow. And the billions of dollars worth of modern American weapons (instead of much-needed economic development) would become a major source of instability. This was president Gamal Nasser's strategy, and Moussa sees himself as the heir apparent.

A more nationalist and assertive Egyptian leadership does not inevitably mean renewed violence. Nasser lost every war with Israel, and Moussa remembers this history. Egypt's current military rulers also have no interest in seeing their eastern border in Sinai with Gaza taken over by Hamas and used as a base for Al Qaeda attacks. But the Muslim Brotherhood has close links with Hamas, and in response, Israel may have to increase the emphasis on its deterrence capability and visibility with respect to Egypt.

Perhaps this is an overly pessimistic scenario, and we can continue to imagine an Egypt where democracy and freedom gain a serious foothold. But it would also be foolish to ignore the rules that govern political power, particularly in the Middle East.

A tropical haven in the Caribbean

The north coast of the Dominican Republic is a beguiling melange of sandy beaches, rugged cliffs and forested mountains. Its natural beauty attracts Canadian and European tourists. Sosua is a prime destination in that lush region, but few holidaymakers realize that it was the site of a Jewish agricultural colony founded by German and Austrian refugees fleeing Nazi tyranny.

I stumbled upon Sosua in 1983 while gathering material for travel stories about the Dominican Republic, which shares the Caribbean island of Hispaniola with the republic of Haiti. Amid palm trees and bougainvillea, I talked to oldtimers, finding their stories of oppression and renewal intriguing.

Sosua emerged as a haven in the wake of the Evian conference, which took place in France in the summer of 1938. Evian was convened by the president of the United States, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to deflect criticism of his restrictive immigration policies.

Thirty two nations attended the conference, but only one agreed to admit Jews. Evian was thus an abject failure. The situation would have been considerably worse had the Domican Republic's dictatorial strongman, Rafael Trujillo, not promised to accept 100,000 Jewish refugees.

Far fewer Jews were ultimately admitted, but who could quibble?

Sosua's role in the resettlement of European Jews is the subject of Allen Wells' first-rate book, Tropical Zion: General Trujillo, FDR, and the Jews of Sosua (Duke University Press). Wells, a historian at Bowdoin College, is not a disinterested observer. His father was one of the 700-plus Jews who settled in Sosua.

As Wells observes, the Roosevelt administration encouraged the Dominican Republic to follow through on its offer. Trujillo really needed no nudging. He was eager to mollify the United States after his army slaughtered 15,000 unarmed Haitians in the 1930s. Obsessed with stemming the tide of Haitian migration into his mixed race country, Trujillo wanted to "whiten" the Dominican population by importing "desirable racial elements to our soil."

It was presumably lost on Trujillo that the Jews he sought were ironically themselves the victims of racial discrimination. Trujillo hoped that the Jewish newcomers would intermarry with Dominicans. In practice, however, only nine Jews wed Dominicans. As a result, Sosua never fulfilled its raison d'etre.

Nonetheless, Trujillo had no regrets. In exchange for his grand gesture and subsequent decision to sever diplomatic relations with Germany, the United States granted the Dominican Republic economic concessions and aid and turned a blind eye to his generally brutal regime.

Interestingly enough, Trujillo also welcomed several thousand Spaniards living in France who had been driven into exile after the Spanish Civil War. As well, he seriously considered inviting 40,000 German farmers. The outbreak of World War II dashed his plan to populate his island nation with farmers from Germany.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, through its Dominican Republic Settlement Association (DORSA), took the lead in facilitating the establishment of the Sosua outpost.

The 26,000 hectare property that DORSA chose at the end of 1939 was coincidentally owned by Trujillo, who had purchased it from the United Fruit Company a year earlier. Trujillo, in turn, donated the plot to DORSA.

The Sosua project was not universally supported by American Jewish organizations. Rabbi Stephen Wise, president of the American Jewish Congress, blasted it as a mirage. Zionists compared it to Birobidzhan, the Soviet Jewish colony in Siberia.

The Zionists had a point.

Due to its poor soil, rocky terrain and lack of water, Sosua was in less than an ideal location. DORSA, therefore, regarded Sosua as a transitory training and orientation ground that would eventually be abandoned.

The new settlers arrived in the Dominican Republic via the United States, marvelling at Sosua's sheer beauty. But as they discovered, only 2,160 hectares were suitable for farming.

There was already a small Jewish community in the Dominican Republic – formed by a nucleus of early 19th century Sephardi merchants from the Dutch West Indies who married local women and joined the ruling elite – when they reached Sosua in 1940.

The new Jewish refugees established friendly relations with the locals, yet often looked upon them condescendingly, says Wells. "Words like 'primitive' and 'backward' crop up frequently in memoirs and interviews," he writes.

Beyond the culture shock, the immigrants had to cope with an unfamiliar steamy climate and constant rainfall, an excellent breeding ground for malaria.

Much of the first year was spent clearing the land and building roads. The first homesteads were occupied in December 1940. Since only 13 of the first batch of 350 newcomers had been farmers in Europe, cultivation was handled largely by native workers.

In mid-1941, a dairy cooperative was set up. It produced first-rate cheese, butter and milk. It proved to be the colony's lifeline, says Wells. By 1945, the factory churned out 100,000 pounds of butter, a million pounds of cheese and 1.5 million gallons of milk per year, all of which were distributed throughout the Dominican Republic.

Entrepreneurial-minded colonists opened up shops, businesses and industries, with seed capital coming from U.S. philanthropic sources and a settler credit union.

Later, in the interest of efficiency, the plots were sub-divided into clusters of 30 hectare homesteads. DORSA supplied water and electricity and managed the elementary school and hospital.

Curiously enough, Trujillo never visited Sosua, though he was pleased by its progresss. Since he was perceived as their patron, the colonists never criticized his regime.

After World War II, 12 Jewish families from Shanghai, itself a haven for Jewish refugees after the rise of Nazism, were persuaded to leave China and settle in Sosua. The fresh infusion ushered in Sosua's golden age, 15 years of steady growth.

Taming the land in Sosua

When a New York Times correspondent visited Sosua in 1953, he wrote that it was "virtually self-supporting, with assets of about one million dollars and no liabilities to speak of."

Despite its prosperity, more than half of its inhabitants had left Sosua by 1950, bound for the United States.

With Trujillo's assassination in 1961, a five year period of political instability ensued as 14 different governments attempted to bring a measure of order to the country.

Landless peasants squatted on the colonists' land, but the police declined to evict them.

By the mid-1960s, the aging and static colony had waned to 35 families, with many of its young people having departed to pursue educational and economic opportunities abroad, especially the United States.

As tourism blossomed, the beach front community was no longer regarded a foreign enclave. Wealthy Dominicans purchased luxurious homes in the hills overlooking the bay and new hotels were built, fueling a red hot real estate boom.

Today, with only 10 Jewish families remaining, Sosua has been transformed into an international resort with billboards and signs in English, French and German.

Quoting a local resident, Wells believes that Sosua's Jewish community will die out within 10 to 15 years, thus bringing to an end a curious footnote in the annals of modern Jewish history.

Another steady and happy year for my family.

I invested with Romspen on the advice of a friend 18 years ago. Throughout I have consistently added to my Romspen account. At one point I took some investment dollars out to put into mutual funds, but I was sorry. It didn't compare to the consistent returns and peace of mind that the Romspen fund gives me. Everyone in my family is a Romspen investor. We like the personal service we get any time we call. I feel fortunate that we are physically, spiritually and financially healthy.

Copts appeal to Jewish community

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Coptic Christians can empathize with a Jewish hardship: the yoke of Egyptian oppression.

Jews have long since sloughed off the slavery imposed by the pyramid-mad Pharaohs. But over the last 50 years, Copts, as they're known, have faced, and face yet again, a potential time of renewed hardship in Egypt. And Jews worldwide could help lend some much-needed moral support, according to one Toronto Copt.

Mike Hanna, one of the Toronto Coptic community's more outspoken advocates of political secularization in Egypt, told The CJN his community needs all the friends it can get to help thwart the kidnapping of the Egyptian democratic revolution by the Muslim Brotherhood.

Hanna, now a pharmacist, immigrated to Canada in 1996 with his family and said that the Copt community has "been completely marginalized" in Egypt since that country's 1952 revolution.

He said estimates peg Egypt's Coptic Christian population at anywhere from 12 to 15 million people out of a total population of nearly 80 million.

Now that the current revolution has toppled former dictator Hosni Mubarak, Hanna said the Copts just want to "restore our ownership in the country. We want to be part of the new government."

The problem now, in the country's transition phase from power vacuum to a new government, is that the Coptic community is still being kept from the drafting table when it comes to a new constitution for Egypt, Hanna said.

He added there is a seven-member committee now in place tasked with drawing up a new constitution, but not one of the members is a Copt.

"We hope Egypt will be a secular country, and not a [sharia law] Muslim country," Hanna said. He cautioned that there is a real threat that the Muslim Brotherhood could consolidate power unless its aims and tactics are exposed by Copts and the West soon.

"With the brotherhood in power, there will be no democracy, no freedom for Egyptians. We need to act now to show that Egypt is not against Islam, but against Islamization."

According to Hanna's sources, the Muslim Brotherhood is beginning to use the cover of democratic reform to push its Islamist agenda.

"The students are now in the background," he said.

Hanna asked to speak with the paper to implore Jews to show solidarity with Copts in Canada and across the world.

"We need to see a Jewish presence in our churches and have an Egyptian Copt presence in synagogues," he said. "We share the same views on democracy... we believe in the same God. We want peace with Israel. I believe in Israel and its policies.

"I believe, if it were not for Israel's [presence and influence in the region] Egypt would have been ruined years ago," he said.

Hanna said he is on the social action committee at the Church of Virgin Mary and St. Athanasius in Mississauga, Ont., and was charged by the church's Father Angelos Saad to speak to the Jewish community about his community's plight.

Hanna, who speaks fluent Hebrew after years of interacting with Jewish clientele at 3M Drug Mart in Thornhill, Ont., is eager to ignite cross-cultural discussion with the Jewish community.

To that end, he said his church has also created a Facebook page that is "open to everyone" to encourage Egyptians back home to carry on with their calls for democratic reform.

Remembering a great Polish illustrator

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Artur Szyk, the great Polish illustrator and caricaturist, was the subject of a recent retrospective.

Szyk, a Polish Jew who was born in 1894 and died in 1951, is a somewhat forgotten figure in spite of his awesome body of work and reputation.

But at a Feb. 15 forum at the Miles Nadal JCC sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada in association with the consulate of Poland, Szyk was remembered and honoured as one of Poland's finest artists of the 20th century.

Among his works were Statute of Kalisz, Haggadah and Washington and His Times.

Szyk's career was reconstructed in a documentary by Piotr Zarebski titled Illuminator.

With Statute of Kalisz in mind, Piotr Wrobel, a University of Toronto historian, followed the film with a lecture on the origins of the 13th-century statute, which granted Jews in Poland an unprecedented degree of self-government.

A small exhibition of Szyk's prints rounded off the event.

Born in Lodz when Poland was still bound to the Russian empire, Szyk displayed a natural aptitude for art. At the age of six, he was already turning out sketches and portraits from his imagination.

His father, a textile factory manager, sent him to Paris to study. Although he was exposed to the latest trends in painting, he was drawn to the medieval technique of illuminated manuscripts, a style he perfected as he matured as an illustrator.

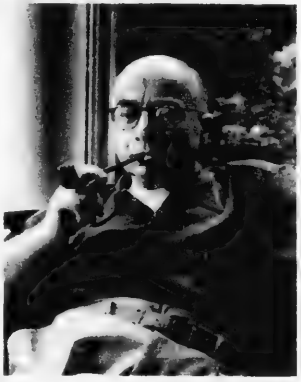
A Zionist, he visited Palestine in 1914 when it was an Ottoman province. During his trip, he met Jewish settlers.

Szyk and his family moved to Paris in 1921, three years after Poland regained its independence.

During this period, he completed Statute of Kalisz, which was published in book form in Germany in 1932, only a year before Adolf Hitler's accession to power.

Sometimes known as Poland's Magna Carta, the Statute of Kalisz was issued by Boleslaus the Pious, the duke of greater Poland, on Sept. 8, 1264. Apart from giving Jews autonomy, the statute extended a variety of liberties to Jews and was ratified by Boleslaus' successors.

Szyk, a proud Jew and Pole, spent two years on his magnum opus. He dedicated it to Josef Pilsudki, the ruler of Poland from 1926 to 1935 and a friend of its Jewish community.



Artur Szyk

Statute of Kalisz was exhibited in more than a dozen towns in Poland. In recognition of his achievement, the Polish government decorated Szyk with one of its highest awards, the Gold Cross of Merit.

In 1935, Poland bought Washington and His Times, a series of watercolours portraying the American revolutionary war. Poland's president presented it to U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt while on a visit to the United States.

Szyk finished Haggadah just before the outbreak of World War II, giving modern meaning to the Passover story at a time when Nazi Germany was persecuting Jews.

He dedicated Haggadah, published in Britain, to King George VI, despite his opposition to Britain's 1939 White paper limiting Jewish immigration to Palestine.

In 1940, Szyk went to live in the United States, where he turned his talents to producing anti-Nazi and anti-Axis caricatures. These drawings appeared in mass-circulation magazines such as Time, Collier's and Esquire.

Granted U.S. citizenship in 1948, he continued to churn out works of extraordinary craftsmanship, including a Hebrew text of Israel's Declaration of Independence.

After his death, he sank into obscurity. But of late, there have been Szyk exhibits in Poland and Germany, and books on his life have been published.

Wrobel, who holds the Konstanty Reynert Chair of Polish History at the University of Toronto, gave a talk on the Statute of Kalisz.

Thanks to the statute, the Jews of Poland enjoyed rights that existed nowhere else in the Diaspora, said Wrobel, whose research focuses on Poland's national minorities, particularly Jews. "It was quite unusual."

Is freedom and tolerance really spoken here?

Chaim Strauchler
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

We see the slogan "Freedom and tolerance spoken here" printed under the Israeli flag on signs all over Toronto these days.

As a community, we take great pride in the freedom and tolerance available to citizens of the State of Israel. We also believe that the values of freedom and tolerance animate our Toronto Jewish community, a community represented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the organization that printed these signs. However, in light of recent revelations regarding our Jewish community, we must ask: is this is an empty slogan, or does it have real meaning?

A recent JTA article that was picked up by Jewish newspapers across North America reported that York Regional Police has rejected claims that Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad @ Flamingo in Thornhill, made homophobic remarks and announced that he would remain its Jewish chaplain.

After a five-month probe, the force said Rabbi Kaplan remains a chaplain "in good standing."

The investigation was prompted by a complaint last August by Kulanu Toronto, a group for lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and queer (LGBTQ) Jews, alleging that Rabbi Kaplan wrote a "homophobic" e-mail to Toronto rabbis.

The controversy arose in the wake of last summer's Gay Pride Parade in Toronto, in which Canadian Jewish Congress urged community-wide support for gay Jews to counter the anti-Israel group, Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, which had planned to march in the parade.

Kulanu also cited a "vile" sermon allegedly offered by Rabbi Kaplan "in which he attacked the LGBTQ community in a more than hateful and disgusting manner." The group asked for a review of his status as a police chaplain.

In a Jan. 11 response to Kulanu, York Region Police said that after speaking with "experts," it has determined that Rabbi Kaplan's statements were a "technically correct interpretation of scripture through his role as a rabbi" and "were not viewed as hateful."

Now that Rabbi Kaplan's name has been cleared, it behooves us as a community to reflect on what happened in this case.

Kulanu Toronto is a Jewish LGBTQ social, educational, and cultural group affiliated with Hillel of Greater Toronto. Hillel receives funding from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

An organization that is funded by our united Jewish communal fund submitted a spurious claim against a rabbi in our community for criticizing community leaders from Congress, federation and the Canada-Israel Committee after they placed a full-page advertisement in the Toronto Star describing Tel Aviv as the gay capital of the Middle East. A Jewish organization submitted a complaint to a local police force because a rabbi publicly criticized how charitable funds were used in advocating for the gay Jewish community.

This is not an issue about homosexuality, but a question of how important issues in our community are handled. When legitimate questions are raised about the use of charitable money, the people who raise them should not be investigated by police departments. The appropriate places to challenge Rabbi Kaplan are in personal conversations and public forums, this newspaper being one of them.

A grave injustice has taken place in our community, and we cannot be silent.

As a rabbi, I am personally invested in this issue. I wonder if my comments from the pulpit – or in this very article – will be met with retaliation by those who would harm me professionally. Jews have a great and sometimes tragic history of machloket – dissent. We champion the machloket leshem shomayim – the dispute for the sake of heaven. Yet, our great prophet Jeremiah was imprisoned for his critique of the king of Judah.

I fear that our preoccupation with presenting a united Jewish community has closed off the avenues for energetic public debate on issues that matter to us. If we believe that honest debate is no longer possible, we may be led to attack the very right of our opponents to voice their views. We may try to silence one another. This is a tragedy.

As a broad Jewish community, we must continue to invite the diversity of Jewish life under our umbrella organizations. Groups such as Kulanu are welcome in our community. Yet, they, too, must abide by our communal standards of tolerance and freedom.

I have not lost my faith in our community's ability to conduct an open debate on important issues. I submit the following questions in this public forum to investigation and debate: should organizations that are part of our Jewish community be required to abide by certain rules (such as derech eretz – common decency – and tolerance of dissent)? How should groups that represent the entire Jewish community integrate the deeply held beliefs of traditional and socially conservative members of the Jewish community when addressing the important issues of the day?

When we have openly discussed these questions as a community without fear, I believe that we can once again declare, "Freedom and tolerance spoken here."

Chaim Strauchler is the spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Finding our name

Rabbi Mark Fishman

Exodus (Shmot, literally "names") comes to a close this week. It's a roller-coaster that never seems to disappoint. The drama, the twists and turns – there's even a love story thrown in. We read about a Hebrew-born, Egyptian-raised and then Midianite-loving shepherd who becomes hero, statesman, redeemer and ultimately law-giver. And that's just in the first few sections!

As we conclude the second book of the Torah for this year, we are changed and challenged. We have read about the ideals of freedom, about loving the stranger because you yourselves were strangers in the land of Egypt (a line that will appear 36 times in the Torah) and about the responsibilities of peoplehood.

Yet, I find myself asking why the rabbis chose the title Shmot/Names for this book. Surely they could have come up with something more provocative!

Upon deeper reflection, I realize that all those in this book seem to be struggling with their names. After being introduced to the clear, unambiguous names of the 12 tribes at the start, we hear: "A man of the house of Levi went and married a daughter of Levi." Not the most helpful verse. But then what about the Hebrew midwives "whose names were Shifra and Puah"? It turns out, according to most commentators, that these were not their real names. Just pseudonyms to mask their identities.

This is followed by perhaps the most fascinating scene of the whole Torah. Moses (an Egyptian name actually, not his real one) meets God at the burning bush. Imagine, given the chance to actually meet God! You could ask any question you like. But Moses inquires: "God, what do people call you? If the Israelites should ask who sent me, what shall I tell them?"

Talk about anticlimactic. This is the moment we have been waiting for and – er – what's your name, again? It seems that even God is reduced to that awkward moment at a dinner party where you bump into someone you know you have met before, but you can't remember who he is. Worse still is God's response: "My name is 'I will be who I will be.'" Ouch! Even God doesn't get a proper name it seems. So what's really going on?

I would suggest that at the heart of this book is the central theme of freedom – leaving behind an old identity for the deeper, more complicated future of becoming a responsible human being. And although in Nelson Mandela's words, it's "a long walk to freedom," it actually begins with the first step. That first step is to know who we are. What are my dreams? What responsibilities am I being called to? Ultimately, what is my name? And if we can answer this question and know who we are, then we are capable of answering any other question (or task) put to us.

In this perspective, we are learning that until we can know ourselves, there remains a part of God that is unknowable. Yet by the same token, if we can learn who we really are, our real names, then we can begin to understand God Himself.

Rabbi Mark Fishman is the assistant rabbi of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

What do Jews believe?

The Talmud tells of a heretic sage, Elisha ben Abuyah, who was violently renounced by his colleagues. Elisha had come to deny God and reject religion.

One day he saw a father send his son up into a tree to perform a mitzvah: before one gathers eggs from a nest, one should shoo away the mother bird. The performance of this deed, according to the Bible, brings long life. The child performed the mitzvah, then fell from the tree and died. Elisha cried out, "There is no justice and there is no judge."

Bookmarks

Bernard Baskin

We, in our time, far more than Elisha, have reason to question and doubt the existence of God and the efficacy of prayer. We have seen the eclipse of the light of goodness and mercy in a world convulsed in violence, suffering and desolation. We have seen loved ones stricken with crippling and life-threatening illnesses, young people die in the vernal hour of life and so many capriciously and arbitrarily wounded by life.

And we ask, "Where is God?"; "Where was God in Auschwitz and Hiroshima?"; "Where is the eternal when the natural catastrophes spell death and destruction for thousands?"; "Where is the loving God in our world in which millions die of malnutrition and starvation and other millions are nameless faces in computerized cultures?"

Is it any wonder that many Jews no longer believe in a personal God who is aware of their existence, responds to prayer and is a force in history. This much is certain: if there was a widespread belief in a personal God, our synagogues would be overflowing with fervent worshippers.

Yet many doubting Jews want to remain within the fold. They consider themselves as part of the Jewish People. Many are involved in Jewish culture, support Israel and a variety of worthy causes.

Judaism was never a monolithic religion. There were true and false prophets, honest priests and cultist, loyal Jews and backsliders. Long before the era of emancipation opened the gates of the ghettos and introduced the many forms of modern Jewish life, there were many profound differences in the community.

A few years ago, Abigail Pogrebin conducted interviews with 62 prominent American Jews, as recorded in her book Stars of David. She asked them how they felt about being Jewish.

They responded favourably about their Jewish heritage: their admiration for the achievements of the State of Israel and their pride in Jewish history. What was shockingly disturbing, however, was their lack of religious faith and lack of involvement in the Jewish community.

Interviewee Harvard law professor Allan Dershowitz proposed his "candle theory of Judaism": the closer you get to the flame of Judaism, "the less likely you are to be a productive, successful creative person. The most successful are those who have moved away from the flame." He adds, however, that the further you remove yourself from the flame, the less likely you are to have Jewish children or grandchildren.

More than anything else our attitude toward disaffected Jews should be ahavat Yisrael, our affection for Jews as fellow members of an ancient and unique people. I know some questing honest skeptics. We need them. They should be warmly welcomed into our increasingly inclusive Jewish community.

IAW: a legacy of inaction

University campuses across Canada and around the world are gearing up for what has become entrenched as an annual ritual of Israel-bashing. Now into its seventh year, the March hate-fest that flies under the banner of "Israeli apartheid week" (IAW) is again triggering unease, if not outright dread, among Jewish students and faculty who are the deliberate targets of its chilling headwinds.

What began as a trial balloon to goad the Jewish community at the University of Toronto in 2005 has morphed into a behemoth that, by last year, had infiltrated more than 50 campuses. Precise numbers for this year are difficult to confirm, since many centres don't declare themselves until the last minute. However, a recent listing identifies 37 committed sites, 15 of which are in Canada or the United States. Compared with previous years, when only one week was designated for programming, guidelines for 2011 are less circumscribed, with a two-week window (March 7-20) as the recommended time frame for IAW activities in Europe and North America. It remains to be seen whether this expanded format brings more centres on board.

But increasing the numbers of locations year by year, though an apparent barometer of "success" for IAW organizers, should not be seen as the criterion of greatest importance when gauging the true impact of this pox on our campus landscape. In effect, what we see repeatedly is the slur of "Israeli apartheid" as a launch point in the abuse of podium that pervades the campus discourse not only during IAW, but year round. Portraying Israel as an apartheid state – with all of its connotations of demonization, delegitimization, criminalization and dehumanization – has been adopted as the weapon of choice for Israel-baiters and Jew-haters.

My View

While university administrations, through their inaction, bear considerable blame for facilitating the violations of free speech that fly under the deception of the Israel-apartheid linkage, our Jewish community leadership, both nationally and internationally, needs also to accept responsibility for its inability and, not infrequently, its unwillingness, to exert the sorts of pressures that may have prevented the growth of IAW from a one-trick pony into an international movement, with a reach that goes way beyond its seven days of infamy each winter.

Sadly, a reluctance to act when it was necessary to do so has evolved into a sense of acceptance that IAW is now a fixture on the academic calendar that needs to be tolerated rather than countered. We were told last year that IAW was on the wane and that, if ignored, it would eventually cease to exist.

Even if this assessment were correct – although there's not a shred of measurable evidence to support it – the damage has already been done. The canard of Israel as an apartheid state has become embedded in the lexicon of the academy, and, with each passing year, its imprint will become more indelible.

There may still be time for action – for a concerted strategy by our Jewish leadership – if not to comprehensively mitigate the racist bias that IAW has already fostered, then at least to stand up against the flagrant exploitation of academic freedoms that gave legs to this abomination in the first place.

Today we wrap up our look at the mezuzah.

The laws applying to mezuzot can get quite complicated. For example, what do you do with an irregularly shaped door or archway? What happens if you are entering a tiny room? What if you're afraid that your outdoor mezuzah will be stolen? The Halacha-Yomi archives offer a detailed look at the laws of mezuzah based on an English translation of the definitive Kitzur Shulchan Aruch [http://bit.ly/mezuz22], while Chabad's Mezuzah Handbook answers many practical questions. [http://bit.ly/mezuz18]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

You can read up on why Ashkenazi homes have the tradition to mount their mezuzot on an angle – basically a compromise between one view that called for vertical placement and another that leans toward horizontal. Ohr Somayach's Ask the Rabbi says we can learn a deeper lesson. "The mezuzah is placed on the door of the house – the house being the abode of husband and wife. The slanting mezuzah 'teaches' every couple how to create shalom bayit – tranquillity in the home. Each one should be prepared to compromise and 'bend toward the other' in helping to lead a harmonious family life." [http://bit.ly/mezuz19]

It's not often that a mezuzah makes the news. But one did in 2005 when Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon affixed a mezuzah to the doorway of Blok 27 in the Auschwitz death camp. Next to it lay the inscription, "That a future generation might know – children yet to be born – and in turn tell their children." (Psalms 78.6) [http://bit.ly/mezuz20]

Sharon's action incensed Michael Handelzalts. He wrote in Ha'aretz, "Places unfit for human presence should not carry a mezuzah... When the prime minister affixes a mezuzah to a doorpost in Auschwitz, he bluntly highlights the meaninglessness of this religious and cultural Jewish symbol." Handelzalts' comments provoked a wide-ranging debate dealing with everything from God's existence during the Shoah, the use of the Holocaust to further a political agenda, and the laws of mezuzot. [http://bit.ly/mezuz21]

The essence of the commandment is the parchment that goes inside the box and not the casing itself. However, the Esek website points out that the decorative container is also important because it endears God's commandments to us. "We live in human forms that react to esthetics. If something is attractive, we are more likely to give it honour or care." [http://bit.ly/mezuz07]

And that brings us to this final story. A wealthy Jewish man buys a fabulous home and brings in a worker to decorate the place. The homeowner buys 50 beautiful mezuzahs and asks the decorator to mount them on the right-hand side of each door except bathrooms and closets. When the owner comes back a few hours later, he sees that the job has been carried out to his total satisfaction. As the decorator is leaving, he says, "Glad you're happy with the job. By the way, I took all the warranties out of the little boxes and left them on the table for you!" [http://bit.ly/mezuz08]

Jewish Agency offers solution to conversion issue

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Natan Sharansky believes he has found an "elegant" solution to a problem that is currently vexing the Jewish world: let the Jewish Agency determine which communities, congregations and rabbinical authorities are legitimate – at least when it comes to performing conversions for the purposes of Israeli immigration laws.

Haviv Gur, the Jewish Agency's communications director, said the organization is perfectly positioned to satisfy the criteria outlined by the Supreme Court of Israel, which requires the Interior Ministry to recognize for purposes of the Law of Return people converted by "recognized" Jewish communities abroad.

The Jewish Agency has 700 shlichim (emissaries) around the world and they are well connected to local Jewish communities, Gur said. "We speak every language the Jewish world speaks. We're saying we have a way to get around this... We'll determine if they're a community that recognizes whether a person is a convert."

The question of Jewish conversions was raised recently in Israel when a number of potential olim – including Thomas Dohlan, a Canadian armed forces veteran – were told their conversions were not recognized and were not eligible to immigrate under the Law of Return.

Under that legislation, converts may immigrate to Israel. The country's highest court has ruled that all converts, whether Orthodox, Conservative or Reform, are eligible. However, the decision to reject Dohlan's Canadian conversion, along with four or five others, came after the ministry consulted with the country's Chief Rabbinate, which dismissed the validity of Dohlan's conversion.

Natan Sharansky

Gur said therein lies the problem. While the ultimate decision on immigration lies with the government ministry, in practical terms the Chief Rabbinate makes the call on Orthodox conversions. The ministry's "bureaucrats and clerks" are not in a position to determine which foreign conversions are legitimate, so they have been asking the Chief Rabbinate for advice.

The Chief Rabbinate is dominated by haredi rabbis, who only accept conversions by about 20 rabbinical courts affiliated with the Orthodox Rabbinical Council of America. Dohlan was converted by a rabbinical court that's not on the approved list after studying with Orthodox Rabbi Daniel Elkin of Congregation Beth Israel in Kingston, Ont.

When it comes to conversions by Conservative and Reform rabbis, the ministry consults with the centralized Conservative and Reform movements in Israel. As a result, Conservative and Reform converts proceed with aliyah while unapproved Orthodox ones are placed in immigration limbo.

The ministry turned down Dohlan's immigration application, although he was allowed to enter Israel on a visitor's visa, along with his Israeli-born wife.

Rabbi Seth Farber

Rabbi Seth Farber, director of ITIM – The Jewish Life Information Center, said the ministry's decision to reject the conversions of Dohlan and the others prompted a strongly worded petition from close to 100 Orthodox rabbis, mostly from North America. Delivered to the Interior Ministry, the petition states, "We are concerned that conversions performed under our auspices are being questioned vis-a-vis aliyah eligibility. We find this unacceptable and turn to you in an effort to insure that those individuals whom we convert will automatically be eligible for aliyah as they have been in the past."

"We represent established communities, synagogues and Hillels around North America. We are certain that whatever criteria are adopted for accepting converts under the Law of Return – particularly given the Israeli Supreme court decision of 1988 – are applicable to those who enter the Jewish people under our direction. Recent reports that the Interior Ministry is consulting with the Israeli Chief Rabbinate are disturbing. As rabbis and as Zionists, we call upon you to clarify the situation and rectify the injustice being done to our converts, ourselves and the Jewish people."

Rabbi Farber called the current situation "outrageous... The Orthodox community is wider than the Chief Rabbinate's view."

Ironically, one of the five converts rejected by the Chief Rabbinate was converted by an approved Orthodox rabbinical court, he said.

Seven people have been rejected in the first three weeks of the policy's application, Rabbi Farber said.

Last week, representatives of several organizations, including the Jewish Agency, Nefesh B'Nefesh, ITIM, the Jewish Federations of North America, Israel's Interior Ministry and the Chief Rabbinate met in Jerusalem. Afterward, Eli Yishai, head of the Interior Ministry and chair of the Sephardi Orthodox Shas Party, reportedly did not agree to retract the policy of consulting the Chief Rabbinate. He did agree to continue the discussion.

Rabbi Farber believes "individuals who meet the normative standards of the community should be recognized."

In comments to Ha'aretz, Sharansky said "I want to separate the argument about conversion from the recognition of Judaism for the sake of citizenship eligibility under the Law of Return. It's so important that a person who undergoes conversion according to the tradition of his community and who the community accepts as a Jew be eligible to make aliyah under the Law of Return."

If the controversy is resolved as suggested by the Jewish Agency, that won't solve all the olim's potential problems. Matters of personal status, such as divorce and burial, are governed by the Chief Rabbinate. But "those are battles for another day," Rabbi Farber said.

UJA, CJC respond to Winchevsky after severing ties

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) were planning to respond to a request for a meeting by representatives of the Winchevsky Centre as The CJN went to press Monday morning.

The two organizations disassociated themselves from the secular Zionist institution after a Feb. 1 event featuring an anti-Zionist speaker.

An e-mail was to be sent out Monday morning, said Howard English, the federation's vice-president of corporate communications. He declined to disclose its contents, saying he wanted the recipients to receive it first.

Maxine Hermolin, executive director of the centre, had requested the meeting in early February, after she was informed of the organization's decision by e-mail Feb. 3. The e-mail invited her to contact English or Len Rudner of CJC if she wished to discuss the matter.

The reason for the delay in answering Hermolin was that "the whole thing has been under discussion. There's been a lot of discussion here," English said.

The event, titled "Never Again for Anyone," featured Auschwitz survivor Hajo Meyer, a member of the International Jewish Anti-Zionist Network (IJAN), which co-sponsored the evening with American Muslims for Palestine and the Middle East Children's Alliance.

Toronto couple boosts Great Texts Project

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

Toronto philanthropists Elisa and Gil Palter have donated a founding grant of $1 million (US) to the Jerusalem-based Shalem Center for its Great Texts Project.

The project aims to translate books that have been most influential in shaping western culture from their original languages to modern Hebrew.

The centre plans to open Israel's first liberal arts college, a.k.a. Shalem College, by the fall of 2012.

"There are an amazing number of holes [in the modern Hebrew canon]," said Yael Hazony, director of Shalem Press, which will translate the texts, among them works by Machiavelli, Hegel, Milton and Hume.

"It's not really surprising [that there are so many holes] when you consider that modern Hebrew is only about 100 years old. We're a young country with a new language, and [classic texts appeal to] a very small market," she said.

Gil Palter said he and Rabbi Daniel Gordis – Shalem Center's senior vice-president – have been friends since the early 1990s when he was based in Toronto as part of the Wexner Heritage Program for young North American Jewish volunteer leaders. Rabbi Gordis was Palter's instructor, and they've stayed in touch since.

Rabbi Gordis is one of the main supporters of the translation project, and the Palters were more than happy to contribute the "lead donation" to it, they said.

"There aren't funds available to Israeli publishers to [translate] classic texts. So our gift gave the initiative a good shot in the arm," Elisa Palter said.

Around the time modern Hebrew developed, in the late 1800s,there was a flowering of classic text translations, Hazony said. Even Hebrew poet Shaul Tchernichovsky translated Homer to Hebrew. But since then, the translation of classics has been reduced to a trickle.

Hazony said Israelis are missing out on a lot of philosophical thought that most Westerners take for granted. "We don't have access in our native language to basic texts that deal with a variety of issues," she said.

Take, for instance, Israel's ongoing debate on whether it needs a constitution. Until Shalem Press published The Federalist Papers, essays advocating the ratification of the U.S. constitution, Israelis debated the issue in an environment unfamiliar with American constitutional history.

Gil and Elisa Palter

"You can really tell that the discourse on this issue has changed since this work was published," Hazony said.

Likewise, she asked, how could Israeli discussion about civil disobedience go on in the absence of information about Mahatma Gandi, leader of India during its independence movement, and American civil rights leader Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., and how could economic discourse take place without knowledge of philosopher Adam Smith's The Wealth of Nations?

The Great Texts Project will give Israelis access to thus-far inaccessible cultural assets of the western world.

"We can be in discourse with the rest of the world, with knowledge and strength, if we have the same intellectual building blocks," Hazony said. "This is a long-term investment in the intellectual property of the Jewish people."

That's why the Palters donated to the project. They've adopted the view that it is imperative the future "thought leaders" of Israel be weaned on these texts to help Israelis "integrate better with the rest of the world," Gil Palter said.

The Palters said Shalem College's core curriculum, which will include studying the influence Judaism and western civilization have had on each other, will enable future graduates help bring Israelis into better relations with the rest of world, because they will understand that world better.

"The Great Texts Project will not only benefit students at Shalem who will be able to study these important books in their first language, but more importantly, will make this great body of knowledge available to all Israelis," said Gil Palter.

The Palter grant will be put toward the translation of some 35 texts, to be determined by scholars at the Shalem Center. Experts in philosophy, political theory, Jewish and Zionist history, Bible and Talmud, Middle East studies, archeology, economics and strategic studies will decide which works are most relevant to the Israeli intellectual context. The first funded work, Machiavelli's Discorsi, was released a few weeks ago.

Each translation, requiring both a native in the work's source language, an individual with academic background on the work's subject matter, and a scientific editor to review each and every line, takes on average twice the time of a regular book translation and up to thousands of dollars. "Translating Plato is not like translating a modern novel," said Hazony, whose press has already translated and published some 40 classic works of philosophy over the last 10 years.

Until now, the press had to scrimp to do the translations. "We are hoping to do more and greater things now that we have direct support for the project," she said. "This grant is really going to propel us forward."

The aim is to have all of the "Palter translations" completed in time for the opening of the Shalem College, the first ever American-style liberal arts college in Israel.

While many of Israel's universities offer undergraduate arts programs, all require students to choose a major focus of study, as opposed to a U.S.-style liberal arts program, based on a well-rounded general education in the arts, and aimed at teaching critical thinking and promoting civil discourse.

In classical antiquity, "liberal arts" referred to the education of a free person, said Dan Polisar, president of the Shalem Center. "It was the education necessary to free citizens in a free country. We think it's critical for citizens of Israel to know Plato and basic economics... to promote civil discourse, and create engaged scholars who are active in the State of Israel."

Rabbi Gordis said that Gil and Elisa Palter "understand that reading and discussing our most important books is the best possible way to teach critical thinking and promote civil discourse.

"They, like we, care deeply about the future of Israel, and about the cultivating of a new generation of thoughtful, worldly and Jewishly committed Israeli leadership."

Situation could create 'active' southern border

"Suddenly, gradually, [Israelis] may awake one morning and find that it's not only the 64 kilometres of Gaza that you have to deal with... but you have a 200-kilometre border with Egypt" to monitor more vigilantly.

This could create an "active" southern border for Israel, he added.

Still, the Egyptian army's traditional role in society and its respected and historic social role precludes it from becoming the next Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps, Gissin said.

Meanwhile, it's the rest of the Arab world that troubles him.

With countries such as Yemen, Tunisia, Libya, Bahrain and Algeria, among others, all experiencing some form of popular uprising, the danger of Iran using these countries as "trojan horses" to spread its malevolent influence is very real, he said.

Israel must "sit tight and watch" as the situation in the Middle East unfolds, Gissin said. "No one knows what's going to happen. The ripple effect is still in progress. But it seems like its a kind of Survivor reality TV show in the region now. Which regimes will fall? There will be a lot of bloodshed. We're in for a very long period of instability in the Middle East with weak governments," and where strong governments emerge, they will likely take the form of fundamentalist Islamic ones.

Raanan Gissin

"The most amazing thing in this whole process that is being overlooked is that the masses are no longer afraid" of their governments, Gissin said.

According to Gissin, the vast majority of protesters in these countries aren't concerned with Israel or the Palestinians. Rather, they want stability in their lives and more freedom.

"In the Arab world now, we're seeing a willingness for [protesters] to run against the bullets. They're saying, 'Leave us alone with all your excuses, your Israel politicking. You have to take care of us first.' This is a [regional] social revolution that has been multiplied by the effect of the Internet."

The hidden treasures of mishloach manot

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

As service chair for Yachad branch of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, I look forward to the task of co-ordinating our annual Purim party for the tenants at the Bathurst-Prince Charles Building. This is an integrated, fully accessible housing project with affordable housing for seniors and independent accommodation for the disabled.

Our guests look forward to the event. Each year they line up impatiently in the hallway until we're ready to open the door to the building's small community room. They enter, young and old, eager with anticipation. Many have walkers or canes, and most are now familiar faces, more endearing each year. They come ready to listen to our entertaining version of the Megillah, to tell us their stories, then to sing and dance. And dance they do, walkers and all, along with the music provided by the versatile and talented Mickey Lewin.

Yachad members contribute an assortment of traditional sweets and fruit for our Purim sweet table. Everyone may feast at the party and take mishloach manot parcels back to their apartments and to other tenants who are unable to attend. Our ambitious bakers provide not only customary hamantaschen, but also an array of delicious cookies and squares, along with some sugar-free treats and fruit. Our sweet table is clearly the highlight of the party.

Near the conclusion of the gathering, the animated room grows silent while everyone enjoys dessert, letting the Yachad members know that once again the occasion has been a great success.

Hamantaschen are not the only traditional sweets found at Purim. Other traditional Purim baked goods often contain something hidden inside. This custom is comparable to the wearing of Purim costumes, where someone's identity is concealed. In the preparation of Purim pastries, fruit, cheese, chocolate, nuts or seeds may be found deliciously "hidden" within the sweets.

BURIED TREASURE BROWNIES

Orange filling
1 egg
1 cup light cream cheese
1/2 cup icing sugar
6 tbsp. frozen orange concentrate, thawed
1 tbsp. orange zest

Brownie batter
2/3 cup butter or margarine
5 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped into small pieces
1 3/4 cups sugar
1/2 tsp. pure vanilla extract
3 eggs
1 cup all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. baking powder
pinch of salt

Prepare a 9x9-inch baking dish with canola spray and line with parchment paper. In food processor, mix ingredients for orange filling until smooth. Remove to a bowl.

Put chocolate and butter together in a covered microwave-safe bowl, heat on high power for about one minute (not much longer or it will burn). Stir until all the chocolate melts and combines with the butter. In original processor bowl, process sugar, vanilla and eggs until light. Add chocolate mixture and pulse until combined. Add flour, salt and baking powder, pulse just until blended.

Pour 1/2 of chocolate batter into pan, cover with orange filling and then pour remainder of batter on top. Use a knife to push down to bottom of pan while making designs throughout the batter. This will create the buried treasure pattern. Bake at 350 for 40 to 45 minutes. Brownies are baked when cake tester comes out clean. Cool completely on rack before cutting into squares. Store in refrigerator until ready to serve.

Pro-Israel students harassed at Carleton

Uproar ensues following defeat of anti-Israel motion

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Pro-Israel students at Carleton University say they were harassed and intimidated by Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA) members after the group's anti-Israel motion was shelved at a student council meeting last month.

Emile Scheffel

"People were banging on the doors, screaming, calling us names... We had to wait until campus [security] sent more officers to make sure students could get safely from the council room out to the elevators," said Emile Scheffel, 21, a fourth-year political science student who isn't Jewish but is involved in the Israel Awareness Committee (IAC) at Carleton.

Scheffel said the incident began when the IAC learned the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) council would be considering a motion put forward by SAIA that would endorse the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel.

"The content of the motion called for socially responsible investment by the university's pension fund... But the section that led in to the motion, the preamble, essentially condemned Israel for various crimes against humanity, for war crimes, and completely unfounded allegations," Scheffel said.

"This was a motion we felt would be unacceptable for [CUSA] to pass, so we exerted pressure to prevent it from happening," he said, explaining that IAC members and others wrote e-mails to councillors before the meeting urging them not to pass the measure, and they urged pro-Israel students to come out to show their opposition to it.

About an hour before the Feb. 17 meeting, held in a boardroom in Carleton's Dunton Tower, about 100 SAIA members began to gather outside to show their support for the motion.

Ryan Flannagan, Carleton's director of student affairs, said that when he made his way up to the boardroom that evening and saw how many people had gathered in the lobby, he decided to allow 20 SAIA members and 20 students who opposed the motion into the room, leaving the rest of the crowd out in the lobby.

"The paramount issue for me was physical safety. At that point, fire capacity issues had been broken and more people were coming onto the floor with every passing minute," he said. "There just wasn't enough space for everybody."

He said SAIA members were very upset with his decision, and when they began to yell and insist that they all be allowed into the boardroom, he called two campus security officers to the meeting.

Scheffel said that while the numbers were even inside the boardroom, in the lobby "our people were outnumbered probably three to one."

When the meeting finally began, Scheffel said, the CUSA executive put forward a compromise motion that endorsed the socially responsible investment policy without singling out a particular state.

"That was something we were very much prepared to support," he said.

"It was passed, and then as a result of that passing, the person who chairs CUSA council... ruled that... the SAIA motion that singled out Israel would not be considered because it was redundant... It would essentially have the same effect, without having singled out Israel."

Scheffel said the decision caused SAIA members outside the boardroom to erupt in anger. "They started banging on the walls and doors, screaming and basically demanding that council reverse the decision. The SAIA members who were inside the room basically went up to individual councillors and began harassing them, berating them and demanding that they reverse their votes."

Outside the boardroom, they chanted slogans including "Shame," "This is not democracy," and "Free, free Palestine."

Scheffel said students who opposed the SAIA motion, especially the Jewish students, didn't feel safe enough to leave the room without being escorted by security officers.

Hashem Hamdy, a 21-year-old fourth-year political science student and the faculty of public affairs councillor, opposed the anti-Israel motion.

He explained that as an Arab who was raised in the west, "the values which I hold closest to me are those of democracy, minority rights, rule of law, rationality, and I see those in Israel, and I see the exact opposite in everyone who opposes Israel."

Hamdy said that SAIA members tried to pass off their behaviour as being "excited and electrified," but he added, "These people were angry. And it was a very hostile environment."

In a statement he released after the meeting, Hamdy went a step further and said, "I truly feel that the university is no longer a safe place for those who support Israel. My personal safety was threatened repeatedly last night, and I am extremely apprehensive about coming onto campus now. I feel like a marked man, like many other students on campus."

Flannagan, who was on the scene, said that while the situation was tense, he didn't feel intimidated. "But I am a university official who has the authority of the university behind me, and I had two university campus safety officers flanking me, so that was helpful," he said.

He was careful not to say that the situation got out of control, but he did say he felt the need to call additional security officers to escort students from the boardroom to the elevators.

"At the end of the day... that's what had to be done," he said. "When you're a person going into a room where people are being quite loud with you and they've got megaphones and it is very intense, it can be intimidating."

Hamdy said the incident proved "how dangerous it is to be an Israel advocate on campuses today, and that something needs to change."

Scheffel said he and Hamdy, who both sit on the university senate, raised the issue at a senate meeting the next day.

"The president of the university did indicate that this is something they are taking very seriously. They made it very clear they are not going to tolerate borderline violence or harassment of this kind on campus," Scheffel said, adding that he's been encouraging students who felt threatened to lodge complaints with Carleton's safety and equity services.

"It's kind of an echo of things that have happened in the past, and it's scary when things get as close to violence as this," Scheffel said, referring to the 2009 incident at York University when Jewish and pro-Israel students were barricaded in the Hillel office by anti-Israel students.

Flannagan said Carleton is committed to giving students a safe place to take part in respectful dialogue and debate.

"Certainly moving forward, we're going to work with all parties to make sure that happens," Flannagan said.

In a statement the day after the meeting, SAIA made scant mention of the confrontational atmosphere. Instead, it framed the compromise motion as a victory.

"This is an important first step" said Reem Bushaisi, a Carleton student and member of SAIA. "Now, we will be taking a motion to the board of governors in March with a clear message: we don't want our money supporting military occupation."

York profs recognized by Polish university

Sheri Shefa

York University professors Michael Brown, second from left, and Mark Webber, second from right, received medals of honour from Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznan, Poland, for their work with the Mark and Gail Appel Holocaust and Antiracism Education program. The medals were presented in October by AMU professor Jacek Witkos, left, and AMU rector Bronislaw Marciniak, right.

Two York University professors were recognized last October with a Medal of Honour from Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznan, Poland, for their work in educating aspiring teachers about the lessons of the Holocaust.

Mark Webber, a German Studies professor who taught at York for 38 years before retiring last July, and York Jewish studies professor Michael Brown were recognized by AMU for co-founding the Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education – Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future.

"The idea is to work with people who are studying to be educators, classroom teachers, professors, adult education providers, journalists, who will then have, we hope, a lifetime ahead of them to work with other people to teach them, not only the facts, but how to deal with difficult issues, specifically racism and antisemitism, which are too clearly recorded in the record of the Holocaust," Webber said.

"So the Holocaust is a kind of study in itself, but it is also a case study in the horrible things that racism can lead to."

The program, an initiative of York's Centre for Jewish Studies and the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, has been bringing Canadian, German, and Polish university students together since 2001.

Each cycle of the program requires students to spend about a month in the summer in Germany and Poland taking part in workshops, meeting with experts, and visiting memorial sites, as well as members of various ethnic communities.

The second phase of the program brings the participants to Toronto for a 10-day symposium the following February, and it includes a public lecture series.

Brown said the students, many of whom are not Jewish, are "remarkably receptive" to the program.

"They say in many ways that this is a life-changing experience. Very few of them are Jewish, very few of them had deep knowledge of the Holocaust before. The program is an eye-opener," Brown said.

"We try to look not only at the past and death and destruction, but also at the living Jewish communities to get a sense of what they are today and what they might have been without the Holocaust. We look at other groups, too, to see if the lessons of the Holocaust have been learned or not."

Webber said the Polish university, which he feels turned out to be "a magnificent partner," wanted to honour him and Brown because of the experience that the program has afforded their students over the past 10 years.

"They were very pleased that by working with York, and with this program, they and their students got the opportunity to do interesting and important things that they otherwise would not have been able to do," Webber said.

Brown and Webber were presented with the award during a ceremony attended by the university's top administrators. "They gathered together to express their appreciation and interest in the program, how good it's been for them and how happy they are to participate," Brown said.

This summer, AMU will once again host some of the program's alumni for a special "retrospective-prospective symposium." The participants will take part in conference presentations, workshops, and field trips in the city of Poznan, Poland, and in Berlin. The summer program will end with a week-long study visit to Israel, where they will partner with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Webber said the fact that AMU agreed to host the group for the summer program reflects their view that "they consider this to be a high-quality program and a very important opportunity to participate in it. It's worth their while."

Brown said that while they have yet to be given an award by a Canadian institution for their work on this project, "we've had recognition in Canada in the sense that we've had people who were willing to support the program, individuals who very generously supported the program, like Gail and Mark Appel, for whom the program is named."

Webber said a program such as this is important because it gives new generations of students the tools to educate others about the effects of racism.

"There are young people out there who are willing and able to combat stereotypes and to create new networks of teaching and learning who change their lives in ways they consider really important and meaningful," he said.

Brown added that some in the Jewish community tend to "focus on the negative, and tend to think that everyone is against us, and yet, here is a group of really wonderful people who are very sensitive to the evils of the past and want to make the world in the future a much better one and are doing something about it."

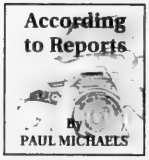
Only real Arab democracy will safeguard peace

While considering what might transpire in Egypt now that president Hosni Mubarak has been forced from office, Michael Petrou (Maclean's, Feb. 21) cited the enthusiasm in some quarters that a pan-Arab democratic revolution is underway.

Nonetheless, Petrou noted that "[t]here are reasons to temper this optimism with caution. It may be premature to talk about the spread of democracy when it is not yet established in Egypt."



Petrou continued: "Yet there are those who claim Egypt isn't 'ready' for democracy, that it lacks a democratic history, and that political freedom will inevitably lead to chaos or, worse, an Islamist state" led by the Muslim Brotherhood.

Turning to Israel, Petrou maintained that not only is this view common there, it's also "widely believed that stable friendly neighbours are better than free ones."

This is grossly unfair to Israel. Israelis have undeniably valid concerns about what Egyptian chaos and the emergence of the Brotherhood could hold in store for the Egypt-Israel peace treaty, for greater belligerence from Hamas, and for the possibility of renewed regional hostilities.

Petrou's take on Israel's concerns is all too common in western media circles, where the term "stability" has become synonymous with "dictatorship." But it's simply wrong to assume that Israel wants to assuage its concerns on the backs of Egyptians. As many Israeli leaders have stated, security for Israelis does not equate with more dictatorship for the Egyptian people, who want to be free of oppression.

If anything, the emergence of a genuine liberal democracy, not only in Egypt but in other Arab countries, would be the best safeguard of long-term development and security for the entire region.

Speaking in the Spanish parliament on Feb. 22, Israeli president Shimon Peres was direct: "We believe the biggest guarantee of peace is having democratic neighbors."

The question whether Egypt (and other Arab countries) can achieve real democracy beyond the mere electoral process is critical – and it's by no means demeaning to Arabs, many of whom have long been raising the issue themselves. For instance, about a decade ago, Mubarak imprisoned well-known human rights activist Saad Ibrahim. In response, Palestinian journalist Rami Khouri wrote in the Globe and Mail (Aug. 12, 2002) on the "battle that pits the forces of enlightened nationalism and democratic activism against the power of governments that behave in an increasingly autocratic manner."

He argued that "the heart of this battle to define the political character of the contemporary world is visible in the issues that Dr. Ibrahim tackled, and that the government clearly did not want him to address. These include the fairness and independent monitoring of elections, the status of minorities in the Arab world, and the freedom of independent civil society organizations to operate without being hindered by the government."

Moving forward to today's upheaval, Khouri wrote in the Toronto Star (Feb. 1) about what he believes to be a revolutionary rejection of autocracy and its replacement by an admittedly slow, time-consuming process of "self-determination" that will allow for the rights, freedom and dignity of Egyptian citizens.

Again in the Star (Feb. 14), while insisting that a process to "a more democratic, humanistic, Arab world" has begun in Egypt and Tunisia, Khouri outlined a number of preconditions that enable real democracy to take hold. On this very point, he wrote: "The must-have anchor for constitutionalism, citizenship and democracy is the rule of law, which has largely vanished in the past three generations in favour of the whims of Arab autocrats and the thuggery of old men with guns."

Khouri blamed foreign powers in both Star pieces, including Ottoman and European colonialism, for the failure of the Arabs to achieve freedom. But there was no looking inward to what might be at issue within the Arab world itself to explain the democratic deficit – a necessary introspection if the region is to move forward.

Taxi driver to appeal

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — While Arieh Perecowicz waited to hear last week whether a local law firm would help him undertake a pro bono appeal of his recent conviction for breaking a taxi bylaw, he remained convinced that justice is on his side.

Perecowicz, 66, is sure he has a case under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

A Montreal law firm was expected to decide this week whether to take it on. As of The CJN's deadline, Perecowicz did not want to name the firm before it had made a decision.

After seven days of trial spread over several months, Perecowicz was recently found guilty in Municipal Court of breaking bylaw 98 of the municipal taxi code, for having things in his cab that have nothing to do with driving a taxi.

In his case, they were a picture of his daughter, a Canadian flag, a Remembrance Day poppy, as well as a photograph of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Schneerson, and two mezuzot attached to the inside pillars of his cab. He believes his Charter case, if it ever comes to trial, is relatively simple: that his religious rights were abridged.

Vancouver families visit Jews in Uganda

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Unless you're going on safari, Uganda is not the first country on most families' travel wish lists.

But when the Rosengarten and Friedland families disembarked at Entebbe in December 2010, vacation was the furthest thing from their mind. The eight Vancouverites had come to build a playground for the Hadassah Primary School in Nabugoye Hill, not far from Uganda's second-largest city, Mbali.

The two families had learned about the Abayudaya – a Luganda word for the People of Judah – through their kids' high school in Vancouver. Students at King David High School (KDHS) had raised $10,000 for the Abayudaya in May 2010, and Gershom Sizumu, the Abayudaya rabbi, had flown to Vancouver to receive the money.

"We realized there was a Conservative Jewish community living in the middle of Uganda," said Natalie Rosengarten. "After that, our friend, Phillipa Friedland, suggested we go to visit them."

The Abayudaya are devout Jews who number approximately 1,100 and observe kashrut and the Sabbath. The sect began circa 1919 with Semei Kakungulu, a military leader who adopted Judaism nine years before his death from tetanus. By then he had a group of followers, but after his passing, they split in two. One group became Christians, and the other, the Abayudaya, became practising Jews.

Their practice of Judaism was by no means easy. Idi Amin, the president of Uganda from 1971 to 1979, outlawed Jewish rituals and destroyed synagogues. By the time his persecutions were over, only about 300 members of the group were left. The rest had converted to Christianity or Islam.

Those members remained strong in their beliefs, however, and began establishing contacts with Jews in Israel and the Diaspora. Today, Uganda has five synagogues and Jewish schools attended by Jewish, Christian and Muslim students.

Back at KDHS in Vancouver, Rabbi Sizumu's visit had a profound impact on David Rosengarten, 17, his sister Gabi, 13, Aaron Friedland, 18, and his sister Elli, 11. "Gabi and her friends had raised $2,000 for the Abayudaya in May, and she was very fired up about the idea of going to Uganda," their mother said.

It didn't seem enough just to visit, though, so the families brainstormed about how they could help, what they could bring and leave behind that would have an important impact on the community.

They decided to partner with a playground contractor to create a playground for the children of Hadassah Primary School. The two families would split the $5,000 cost of the playground and help install it on their visit. At the last minute, Vancouver Talmud Torah contributed $1,800.

In preparation, everyone received inoculations and ensured their malaria tablets were packed and ready to go. Both families are originally from South Africa, and they stopped there first before flying into Entebbe and driving six hours to Mbali.

They stayed in a guest house in Nabugoye Hill in conditions that were more luxurious than those of the locals. The guest house had cold, running water and some electricity, but no stove or refrigerator. A Muslim woman cooked their meals on a coal stove, and for two days the families worked in 32-degree-Celsius weather preparing a site for playground equipment.

They saw the community from the perspective of outsiders, noticing the mud huts, the absence of electricity and running water, the number of AIDS orphans at the school and the dearth of lighting, chalkboards and other educational instruments.

Everything changed, though, as Shabbat approached.

"On Friday afternoon, we noticed a buzz of activity as people were cleaning their vegetables, making challah in coal ovens and getting their children clean and tidy for the Sabbath," Rosengarten said.

"As we walked to shul, we heard a traditional African beat and the words of Lecha Dodi being sung. All of a sudden, these people who had seemed so foreign to us were singing songs we knew, with the same tunes!"

On Saturday morning, David and Aaron carried the Torah, and later the families gathered with other Jews outside the synagogue for a shiur and a havdallah service.

"Shabbat with the Abayudaya was a highlight for us," Rosengarten said. "Until that time, we were doing work in what could have been any community. But on Shabbat, we truly witnessed something spectacular."

Back in Vancouver, she said the trip to Uganda is like a gift that keeps on giving back to them.

"My kids keep talking about what they saw and how privileged they are," she reflected. "They noticed how happy the Uganda children are, despite how little they have."

The trip itself was a fleeting idea first discussed in the hot tub at their vacation home. It could easily have been dismissed, she said.

"The fact that we made it happen is the whole story. What I learned is that if you want to do something, it's not that complicated," she said. "And it felt good to leave something tangible behind, because there is so much need there."

Montreal city hall slams shoe store boycott

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —Montreal city council adopted a motion Feb. 22 "deploring" the boycott campaign against a St. Denis Street store that sells footwear made in Israel.

But it was not unanimous. The vote was 38 to 16.

The motion was proposed by Mayor Gérald Tremblay and supported by his Union Montréal party, which holds a majority of the seats. It was opposed by opposition leader Louise Harel and members of her Vision Montréal, while the third party, Projet Montréal, was split. Its leader Richard Bergeron left the chamber when the vote was taken.

Mayor Gérald Tremblay

The store, Boutique Le Marcheur, is located in the Plateau Mont-Royal borough, which is represented by Projet Montréal. Since October, the group Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) has been staging small demonstrations outside the store on most Saturday afternoons to protest its sale of Israeli-made BeautiFeel merchandise.

PAJU supports the international boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel for its alleged violations of international law and Palestinian human rights. The group accuses the Israeli government of pursuing a policy of apartheid against non-Jews.

The council motion states that, "by virtue of the principles of free enterprise and the free market, the municipal council supports the owner of this business, Monsieur [Yves] Archambault, who has been established on this street for 25 years."

The council also declared its support for the understanding on co-operation between the governments of Quebec and Israel, which was signed in 1997 and renewed in 2007.

Tremblay introduced the motion by saying that the months-long demonstrations outside the store are contrary to the spirit of the city's Charter of Rights and Responsibilities, which upholds "tolerance, peace and inclusiveness." That document stipulates that "every citizen has the duty to refrain from behaviour that would infringe on the full exercise by others of their rights, thereby undermining the dignity and quality of life of all."

While citizens have the right to protest in the exercise of their freedom of speech, he continued, such action can cross the line into harassment when carried on for so long against a single merchant. He noted that only two per cent of Le Marcheur's merchandise comes from Israel.

"Never in Montreal have we prevented demonstrations... But there are abuses of protest, there are abuses of rights," he said. The mayor also said that the demonstrations are "harming Montreal on the international scene."

The motion sparked a heated debate of nearly an hour's duration.

Harel countered that the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms supersedes the municipal charter, guaranteeing the freedom of expression, including demonstrations. She also said this wasn't an issue for a city council.

Harel, a former Parti Québécois cabinet minister, recalled that she had participated in many boycott campaigns, including the selling of South African wines in Quebec. (She has in the past been a critic of Israel as well.)

Projet Montréal councillor François Limoges argued that it's not the role of a municipal council to "interfere and tell citizens 'you are committing an offence of opinion.'"

On Feb. 9, a similar motion was tabled in the Quebec National Assembly, supported by members of the three major parties, but it wasn't debated because sole Québec solidaire member Amir Khadir refused to give his assent. He said his party's position is that the Quebec-Israel agreement should be suspended until Israel ends its "discriminatory" policies against the Palestinians.

On Feb. 12, PAJU extended its demonstrations to the Naot store across the street from Le Marcheur, in what it calls "phase II" of its goal of making St. Denis an "Israeli apartheid free zone."

Abbas delays visit to Canada

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Plans for Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas to visit Canada in the near future to meet with Canadian Jewish leaders are still on, even though the visit has been put on hold because of upheaval in the Arab world.

"For now, nothing has changed" regarding the plans, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler told The CJN last week. He and Abbas privately arranged for the visit when they met in Ramallah last December.

In Canada, the meeting is slated to be hosted by the bipartisan joint House-Senate Committee on the Middle East Peace and Reconciliation that includes fellow Liberal MP Bob Rae and Tory senators Linda Frum and Hugh Segal.

A cross-section of the Jewish community is supposed to meet with Abbas.

Cotler told The CJN in late January that Abbas' visit would take place "within the next six months." Soon after, he said in off-the-record remarks (which have since been reported in another publication) that the original date for the visit was February, but was rescheduled to April due to the unexpected turmoil in the Arab world – timing that still fell within the "six months."

Unless the trip is delayed again or cancelled, however, the six-month time frame – which would lapse during the summer – remains in effect, he said.

Cotler, contrary to a report in the other publication, did confirm that Canada-Israel Committee head Shimon Fogel, as The CJN reported Feb. 10, was the first Canadian Jewish leader to be made aware of Abbas' planned visit, even though other Jewish community figures were subsequently notified.

However, Cotler said that one quote in the Feb. 10 report – attributed to Abbas, suggesting that Israel was responsible for "incitement" against the Palestinians – was erroneous.

כששמעו ה"רופאים ללא גבולות" שמקורם היה בצרפת שרופאים ישראליים מטפלים בחולים- הם סרבו לשתף איתם פעולה בטענה שישראל היא מדינת אפרטהייד ורופאים ישראליים שותפים בפשעי מלחמה.

טובת החולים הקונגולזים לא עמדה לנגד עיניהם של הרופאים ללא גבולות. הם נתנו לדיעותיהם הפוליטיות להשכיח את שבועת היפוקרטס.

אין גבול לחוצפה, ואין סיבה לתמוך בהם.

Israeli rocket scientist shares passion in Barrie

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When asking a bona fide rocket scientist what inspired him to pursue a career in aerospace engineering, one might expect a response more sophisticated than "I like to burn things."

But Victor Chernov, a 33-year-old graduate of the Technion Institute of Technology, who obtained his PhD last year in aerospace engineering and is currently the Leon Sachs Post-Doctoral Fellow at the University of Toronto, is very straight-forward about what he knows and loves.

His lecture, titled "It Doesn't Take a Rocket Scientist... Well, actually, it does," was organized by the Canadian Technion Society and held at Jackson's Toyota dealership in Barrie, Ont., late last month.

Members of Barrie's Jewish community heard about his work at the Technion with gel-fuelled rockets, which he explained are safer than rockets powered by standard hydrocarbon fuels because the chance of spills and leakages are minimized.

Dr. Victor Chernov

Speaking with a thick Russian accent, Chernov, who has toured Western Canada speaking to crowds in Regina, Calgary and Vancouver, and has plans for an Eastern Canadian tour in May, spoke to The CJN about his journey from the former Soviet Union to Israel when he was a child, his passion for engineering and the work that brought him to Toronto last year.

Following the collapse of communism and the rise of antisemitism in the former Soviet Union, Chernov's parents – both of whom were engineers – decided to move to Israel to pursue an opportunity for a better life.

Chernov said he "liked playing with [model] airplanes since I can practically remember myself," but his love of engineering was reinforced in Israel.

His childhood obsession propelled him forward to pursue an education in the field and after completing his PhD with the Technion in August, Chernov said he's happy to be immersed in challenging work at U of T.

Chernov, a recipient of the Ilan Ramon scholarship for space-related research from the Israeli Ministry of Education, said he chose to accept the offer to be the Leon Sachs Post-Doctoral Fellow because of U of T's reputation as a good university.

"U of T has a good name in good standing, and the fellowship that Leon Sachs offers for this... is a very generous one," he said.

"It's a combination of this being a good university, it's a combination of this being a generous fellowship, and it's a combination of this being a big city with a big Jewish community, which is also important."

Chernov said his work now consists of investigating soot behaviour in combustion.

"Soot consists of really small particles on a nanoscale. In most cases, it is undesirable stuff. When you burn something – usually when you burn hydrocarbon fuels, which you have in cars, airplanes and many other things – you usually get it," Chernov explained.

"You have some amount of soot coming out of the combustion system. The idea is that this is something that can be prevented, theoretically. The idea is to understand how the soot is created and how it behaves."

He added that the goal is to understand how it works and how it's produced so that researchers can determine how to prevent its production because "it's not good for your health, it's not good for the environment and it's not good for the engines."

Despite the cold weather, Chernov said he's enjoying his time in Toronto thanks in part to the Canadian Technion Society.

"They've made my life easier here and they are very supportive," he said, adding that the lecture tours they organize have enabled him to experience more of Canada than most Canadians.

With the Leon Sacks program ending in July 2012, Chernov said he plans to return to Israel in the hope of landing a job with the Technion.

"I'd love to become a part of the Technion, but of course, only if they want me and if I'm good enough. But that is Plan A."

Success in the Workplace

The journey around Lorne's employment at UJA Federation is one worth sharing. It involves the collaboration of Reena, UJA Federation, and Jewish Vocational Services working in partnership towards a common goal.

Lorne's Story

Lorne is a wonderful, happy, independent man whose smile has the ability to make the sun shine. Lorne has autism, communicates in a variety of ways, and is very resourceful when trying to make himself understood. With some support from Reena, Lorne has lived in his own apartment for many years. Prior to working at UJA Federation, Lorne worked at Rogers Cable Television in the business office for seventeen years. When the business office moved to Brampton in 2006, Lorne spent an hour and a half on several buses getting to the new location. His mother was very nervous, but knew that Lorne had transferable skills, if only someone would give him a chance to use them. She was very aware that it would be hard for people to see beyond the fact that Lorne was non verbal.

With the support of Reena, she approached UJA Federation. They were open to meeting Lorne to discuss possibilities for employment. The interview went very well, and she was pleased that the individuals were so respectful and engaging of Lorne. Thus began his employment at UJA. To ensure a smooth transition to his new job, Lorne was supported by a job coach from Jewish Vocational Services.

It is now three and a half years that Lorne has been working at UJA Federation. He has worked for many people, has had a number of different offices, and has carried out several diverse tasks. He has truly embraced these changes, and has managed very well. He has not needed a job coach for quite some time, and is currently part of a team of men who appreciate his hard work, and respect his uniqueness. They value him as a contributing team member. Lorne's mother says "I can only hope that as much as Lorne has learned, he has also been a good teacher, and has taught people to have an appreciation of diversity."

Canada 'goes beyond' UN sanctions on Libya

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Not only has Canada implemented new UN-adopted sanctions against Libyan President Moammar Gadhafi, it has added some of its own.

On Saturday, the UN Security Council passed resolution 1970, calling for an arms embargo that requires all states to prevent the sale or supply of arms to or the export of arms from Libya; the inspection of cargo going into Libya; a travel ban on Gadhafi and 15 individuals closely associated with him, and an asset freeze against him and members of his family.

Canada implemented the sanctions and imposed additional ones on Sunday.

"Canada has decided to go beyond the Security Council sanctions. Our government will impose an asset freeze on, and a prohibition of financial transactions with the government of Libya, its institutions and agencies, including the Libyan Central Bank," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said in a statement Sunday night.

"These actions will help restrict the movement of, and access to money and weapons for, those responsible for violence against the Libyan people."

The UN also referred the Libyan government's "ongoing violent repression of civilian demonstrators" to the International Criminal Court.

On Sunday, Gadhafi dismissed the UN sanctions against him and said a small group of rebels protesting his rule were surrounded and would be defeated.

In a telephone interview with Serbia's Pink television station, he said Saturday's United Nations Security Council vote imposing travel and asset sanctions on him and close aides was null and void.

"The UN is not allowed to meddle in the internal affairs of other countries, unless a country is attacking another state," Gadhafi told the Belgrade-based station. It said he had been speaking from his office in the Libyan capital of Tripoli.

Gadhafi accused the world body of "making decisions on the basis of news reports" and said a UN commission should investigate the situation in Libya.

"The people of Libya support me. Small groups of rebels are surrounded and will be dealt with," he said.

The Libyan leader repeated that he would not quit his country: "I am here. I am not leaving," he said.

On Sunday, rebels in eastern Libya said they had formed a national council that would help free areas still under Gadhafi's rule.

On Feb. 14, Gadhafi tried to use the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to deflect attention away from his country's uprising, calling all Arab states that maintain relations with Israel "cowardly regimes" and urging Palestinians to mass on Israel's borders until their demands are met.

Israel allowed 300 Palestinians from Libya to enter the West Bank on Feb. 23.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu made the decision based on "humanitarian reasons," acceding to a request by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to allow them to flee the unrest in the North African country for the West Bank.

Protests against Gadhafi's regime have continued since Feb. 15. During that time, reports of civilian deaths range between 600 to 2,000 people killed in clashes with pro-government forces.

"A government's first and most fundamental responsibility is to protect the safety and security of its citizens. Mr. Gadhafi has blatantly violated this most basic trust. Far from protecting the Libyan people against peril, he is the root cause of the dangers they face. It is clear that the only acceptable course of action for him is to halt the bloodshed and to immediately vacate his position and authority," Harper said.

Don't boycott Mideast's only democracy

Bernard-Henri Lévy
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

Since it's necessary to spell things out, let's do so. I have never, directly or indirectly, pressured anyone to cancel a meeting in support of the partisans of the boycott of Israel.

This would have been absurd because, by nature and by conviction, I believe in the power of ideas and even more, in that of the truth. In such circumstances, I am always in favour of debate, the clash of opinions, even the confrontation of convictions – hence, not of censure.

And the fact is that in the matter of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign, I am more than happy to be able to present facts and evidence that seems to have escaped the organizers: namely, that we are faced here with a skilfully orchestrated but calumnious, bellicose, anti-democratic and, in a word, despicable campaign.

Why?

First, because one boycotts totalitarian regimes, not democracies. One can boycott Sudan, guilty of the extermination of part of the population of Darfur. One can boycott China, guilty of massive violations of human rights in Tibet and elsewhere. One can and should boycott the Iran that is oppressing Sakineh Mohammadi Ashtiani, who was condemned to death by stoning for adultery and complicity in the murder of her husband, and the imprisoned filmmaker Jafar Panahi. Iran is a country whose leaders have become deaf to the language of common sense and compromise.

Bernard-Henri Lévy

One can even imagine – as we once did with regard to the fascist generals of Argentina or of Brezhnev's Soviet Union – boycotting those Arab regimes whose citizens' freedom of expression is forbidden and where those who disobey are punished by death.

One does not boycott the only society in the Middle East where Arabs read a free press, demonstrate when they wish to do so, send representatives to parliament and enjoy their rights as citizens. Regardless of what one thinks of the policies of its government, one does not boycott the only country in the region – and beyond the region – where voters have the power to sanction, modify and reverse the position of said government.

Stephane Hessel's indignation with the workings of democracy in his recent bestselling book, Indignez- Vous! – that democracy is by definition imperfect but perfectible – is at best, profoundly stupid and at worst, disgraceful. Yet he has nothing to say about the millions of victims of Africa's forgotten wars, about the persecution of Christians in the Middle East or about the massacre of Bosnia's Muslims.

The boycott campaign is indifferent to the particular stance of Mr. X or Mrs. Y. toward their own government. It is unaware of, nor does it care to know, what Israeli citizens themselves think, for example, of the resumption of settlement construction in the West Bank. It doesn't give a hoot about demands, parameters, actual conditions of peace between Israelis and their Palestinian neighbours.

Of the latter, it doesn't give a tinker's damn and never says anything, either about their aspirations, their interests, their hopes and the way the Hamas regime has smashed those hopes in Gaza.

No. Regardless of what the BDS promoters and its useful idiots say, the only real goal of this boycott campaign is to delegitimize Israel as such. That is what the comparison with the South Africa of apartheid implicitly expresses. That is what the anti-Zionist rhetoric that serves as the common denominator of all the groups comprising the BDS movement explicitly says, what signifies their intent to undermine the very idea that binds the Israeli nation.

And that is why this campaign, in fact, contravenes the customs, rules and laws of international, French or American national law.

Lastly, there are those at the heart of this campaign whose inspiration is not that of de Gaulle's Free French organization nor of those who penned the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, nor of those in favour of a just peace between the Israeli and Palestinian peoples.

Umberto Eco bashes boycott

Maya Sela
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Celebrated Italian novelist Umberto Eco challenged those who advocate cultural boycotts and said that censuring artists because of actions committed by their governments was akin to racism.

Eco spoke during a press conference last week at the 25th annual Jerusalem International Book Fair.

Ian McEwan, whose 11 novels include Atonement and Amsterdam, accepted the prestigious Jerusalem Prize at the opening ceremony of the book fair. His acceptance speech was peppered with tough criticism of Israeli policy toward Palestinians in the West Bank and East Jerusalem.

British writers had called on McEwan to reject the Israeli literary prize in protest at Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

Eco told reporters that unlike McEwan, he faced no pressure from colleagues to stay away from the Israeli book fair and that he opposes boycotts. "I consider it absolutely crazy and fundamentally racist to identify a scholar, a private citizen, with the politics of his government," Eco said.

Asked about his opinion of the Israeli government, Eco would only comment that he has too much to say against the Italian government to speak about the Israeli government.

Eco, 79, the author of The Name of the Rose and Foucault's Pendulum, is one of Italy's most popular novelists. His most recent historical novel, The Cemetery of Prague, has attracted criticism from both the Vatican and the chief rabbi of Rome, for what some argued was an overly convincing presentation of the arguments of modern antisemitism – though the author clearly had the opposite intention.

At the press conference, Eco said he had a very talmudic mind and once even suspected he was of Jewish heritage, since his grandfather was adopted, although his grandmother was Christian, which by Jewish religious law makes him a Christian. He said his fascination with Jewish culture is evident in his books, and when asked to name his favourite Israeli authors, he said he particularly enjoys reading A.B. Yehoshua.

Even before becoming acquainted with Israeli literature, he had ties to the country, Eco said. In this connection, he mentioned his relationship with Moshe Idel, a professor of Jewish thought at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, whom Eco described as "my personal kabbalist."

Knesset visit proved revealing

"We challenged their notions and gave them another way to look at the [Israeli-Palestinian] narrative," Farber said. "And in the end, I think we succeeded in getting them to understand that not one narrative necessarily rules. This is not a country of black and white. It's full of grey, and I think they got that. We're thankful to have had the opportunity to show them a side that I believe they would not have been able to see if we didn't provide it."

Farber said the church's policies are reflective of the information its members have received. "I believe that these are honest folks who want to do the right thing, but really require information. This is exactly the kind of work we [at the CJC] should be doing... making a difference where it matters most."

The CJC's efforts seemed to have had an impact. "The opportunity to hear more specifically from the Israeli perspective has been a good one," Rev. Giuliano said. "The CJC has done a tremendous job getting us access to the [right] people and to the perspective that Israelis want us to hear. At times I feel they think we didn't get that, and so we are grateful to them for assisting with that."

This new information stands to play a role in the adjustment of the church's policies, the assignment that was given the mission at the General Council meeting last August.

"We were asked to prepare a new policy paper on the [church's] relationship with this area and how we might shift the direction of that," Rev. Giuliano said.

He pointed to a few different areas where the mission may recommend policy adjustments.

The first is settlements: "We are quite concerned about issues related to the occupation and settlements, and what a barrier that is to peace in the region, but after visiting Maale Adumim, we see what a challenge [the dismantling of settlements] would present for the return to pre-'67 borders."

The visit to the Knesset also proved revealing, he said. "We met someone from the Palestinian government and someone from the Knesset, and it's just amazing to us how radically the narratives differ. It's hard to believe they're talking about the same place and events."

Seeing the Supreme Court brought another revision in their thinking, Farber said. "I think seeing how the Israeli justice system works is quite impressive to people. Any citizen of Israel can petition the Supreme Court, and I think that's a real eye-opener."

After seeing Yad Vashem, Rev. Giuliano said he realized that "it is profoundly important for Israel to have security and a sense of safety. That's a dominant theme we have experienced with our Israeli hosts and friends."

Established in 1925 through the union of Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches, the United Church is the largest Protestant congregation in Canada, claiming almost 600,000 official members among three million who identified themselves on the 2001 Canadian census as affiliated with the church.

The church is involved in social justice projects throughout the world, from supporting international peace movements to combating poverty and hunger. Their support of the Palestinians is one such project.

"We have an interest in what little we can do to support the peace process and human rights issues that are arising in Israel and Palestine," Rev. Giuliano said. "We feel compelled to be a part of it. Our faith is lived in real time in the real world, and this is a part of that."

Farber said he admires the church's global involvement. He added that CJC played an instrumental role in convincing the church to vote down the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) bill against Israel at the General Council meeting in 2009.

Rev. Giuliano noted, however, that the church's decision on a boycott of Israel may not be final. "We have not arrived at any final conclusions about that. We need to give it some thought," he said. "There are groups, both here and in Canada, that are pushing the United Church to support that work."

The church's task force's recommendation on this and other issues of church policy pertaining to Israel and the Palestinians will appear in a report to be released in September, ahead of the United Church's 41st General Council meeting in August 2012, in Ottawa. The report will be available online at the church's website.

Until then, the church hasn't drawn any final conclusions. "We have a number of [Palestinian] partners in this part of the world who we've been supporting and working with for a long time. It's not like we will suddenly stop doing that," Rev. Giuliano said. "At this point, we're in the information-gathering stage, so I can't say a lot about where this might lead us. In general, we're hoping for the best for this region. We believe there can't be peace for anyone until there's peace for everyone."

I submit that Omar Barghouti, one of the founders of the Palestinian BDS campaign, affirms that his goal is not two states, but two Palestines. Ali Abunimah, a co-founder of electronic intifadah who is also opposed to the two-state solution, does not hesitate to compare Israel to Nazi Germany. The leaders of Sabeel, the Palestinian Christian group firmly implanted in North America, who are anxious to lend a "theological" basis to the idea of "responsible investment," do not hesitate to reactivate the stereotype of the Christ-killing Jew or resort to rather shady initiatives whose purpose is to mark Jewish – sorry, Israeli – merchandise with derogatory stickers intended for the attention of the vigilant French consumer.

All that is deplorable and, once again, indisputable. Presenting the promoters of this discourse of hatred as victims speaks volumes of the current state of confusion – intellectual and moral – of a western world one would have hoped had been cured of its worst criminal past.

Philosopher Bernard-Henri Lévy is the author, most recently, together with Michel Houellebecq, of Public Enemies: Dueling Writers Take On Each Other and the World (Random House).

Israel Briefs

PM warns Palestinians

Following a Feb. 24 rocket attack on Be'er Sheva from Gaza, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel won't tolerate the bombing of its citizens. "This is something that no country in the world would agree to and we will act accordingly," Netanyahu said. Two long-range Grad rockets struck Be'er Sheva, one hitting an apartment building. No one was injured in the attack, the first to strike the southern Israeli city since the Gaza war in 2009. The Israel Defence Forces responded, striking several targets during what it termed an extensive operation in Gaza. Six mortar shells fired from Gaza also landed in southern Israel on the afternoon of Feb. 24, the IDF reported. In the past two months, more than a dozen explosive devices have been detonated along the security fence, the IDF said.

Iranian warships in Syria

Two Iranian warships that passed through the Suez Canal docked in Syria. The ships, a frigate and a supply ship, arrived at Syria's main port at Latakia on the night of Feb. 24 after becoming the first Iranian naval ships to pass through the canal since the 1979 revolution. The Egyptian defence ministry allowed the ships to pass through the canal. They're expected to return to Iran early this month. Iran's sending ships to Syria as uprisings take place across the Middle East was a show of power, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak told CNN. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said at the beginning of the week that his government took a "grave view" of Iran's plan to send the ships. According to international rules no vessel can be denied passage unless it is at war with Egypt.

When life throws you a curve

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Sometimes life or someone in your life throws you a curve that is simply unfair. We don't deserve it, we say to ourselves. We haven't asked for it, we don't want it, and we spend a lot of time wondering why sometimes in life bad things happen to good people.

Life is not always fair, and when we haven't been treated properly, often our reaction is to feel hurt and angry, and to take it out on the last person we should take it out on – ourselves. In the film Black Swan, rather than express her hurt feelings to the individuals who are inflicting hurt upon her, Natalie Portman's character inflicts it upon herself, in some very troubling and disturbing scenes. We always want to treat others with kindness, but we have to remember to be kind to ourselves as well.

So how we can take difficult circumstances and turn them into opportunities for growth and learning, or simply put, make lemonade out of the lemons in our lives? Well, first of all, you have to know when to withdraw. Sometimes we fight so hard to right a wrong, yet there comes a time when you have to move on.

Or ask yourself: what kind of opportunity am I being given? Ask that question and take the difficulty and turn it around. This doesn't mean necessarily getting out of the game. Just take the curveball and find new ways to deal with it. Even if you strike out, you may have only lost an inning, not the game; or the game, but not the series.

Also be happy and content with what is good in your life. Always be happy with what you have, because even when you're in a difficult situation, the minute you thank your lucky stars and are grateful for the silver lining, things inevitably start to turn around.

I'll never forget when my son was learning to play baseball. The team needed a coach, and I had no idea how to play ball and knew that I had to learn a little more about the game (such as how to throw the ball!). So I went to a sports store and asked if there was a kid who could teach me how to play baseball, so I could teach my son and help out the team. Now I'm not going to profess to being an expert, but I did learn a couple of baseball tips that I'd love to share with you, that have become some great tips for living well.

One: keep your eye on the ball. Stay focused on what you are doing and you will be ahead of the game.

Two: be a good sport, no matter what happens. Everything always works out in the end.

Three: when someone throws you a curveball, throw it back. Don't give up. What is the opportunity? Even if you lose a game, there are many more games to come. Keep playing.

And finally, at baseball games I used to go up to each batter and whisper in his ear, "You are going to have your best hit and game ever," and that is often what would happen.

So the next time someone throws you a curveball, keep your head high and know that with a positive attitude and a good heart, you are already a winner, and who knows, your next hit could actually be a home run!

Physician spreads word about colon cancer screening

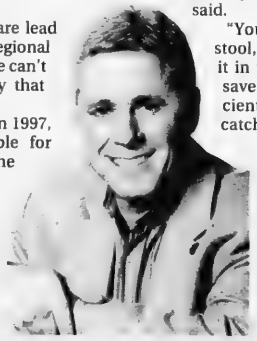
Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

With March being national Colorectal Cancer Month, Dr. Sandy Buchman is taking the opportunity to spread the word about preventative screening.

A family physician and primary care lead with Cancer Care Ontario's Toronto regional cancer program, Buchman, 56, said he can't put it any more simply than to say that "screening saves lives."

Cancer Care Ontario, established in 1997, is the provincial agency responsible for improving cancer services and is the government's cancer adviser.

Among other services, it directs close to $700 million in public dollars to hospitals and other cancer care providers. It also implements provincial cancer prevention and screening programs, plans cancer services to meet current and future needs, and works with local health care providers to improve cancer care.



Dr. Sandy Buchman

Buchman admits that screening rates for colon cancer are poor. "Rates in Toronto are only 24 per cent of those who should be screened. All colon cancer comes from polyps, and they take a long time to develop. If they're caught early, there is a 90 per cent chance of cure."

By 2020, he said, if 50 per cent of the eligible population gets screened, "they'll be able to save 1,500 lives. By 2030, 5,500 lives will be saved."

People of average risk can benefit from a fecal occult blood test, which tests for the presence of microscopic or invisible blood in the stool, he said.

"You simply take a sample of your stool, place it on a slide, seal it, and put it in the mail. It's an easy test that can save lives in a big way. It is cheap, efficient and private. It is a big net. It can catch a lot of fish and is less risk than a colonoscopy. It also increases the capacity within hospitals to perform colonoscopies."

Encouraging people to get screened for colon cancer is difficult, he said, because "many people don't want to talk about it. Certain cultures are embarrassed, and for some there is a language barrier. Our challenge is to reach the vulnerable populations."

He advises everyone 50 and older to see their family doctor and discuss the most appropriate screening method. "A colon cancer check truly makes sense. If we improve our rates, we will ultimately save lives."

Canada, Israel, China and India to co-operate on water issues

Paul Lungen

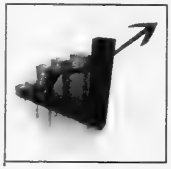
Dan Vilenski was probably pretty good at arithmetic in elementary school, but somehow the rules that apply there don't necessarily translate into the high-tech world of international business. As far as he's concerned, one plus one can equal five – given the right set of circumstances.



Creating those circumstances is one of the reasons he was at last week's Multilateral Roundtable on Sustainable Water Management in Edmonton, which brought together representatives from Canada, Israel, China and India who have a special expertise in nanotechnology.

"The name of the game today is to join forces and co-operate on scientific and technology issues so that one plus one is going to be five," Vilenski said.

An entrepreneur and director of the board of the Israel National Nanotechnology Initiative, Vilenski was optimistic that last week's meeting could lead to commercially applicable solutions to international water management problems. Israel, he said, is a world leader in desalination and water-purification technologies, while the other parties also bring their technologies and other strengths to the table.

Israel entrepreneur Dan Vilenski addresses the Multilateral Roundtable on water management that was held last week in Edmonton.

That joint effort is the key to success: "In today's business or high tech, individual countries or persons in academia or companies can't come fast enough with solutions or products," he said.

Bringing the four nations together to develop strategies for addressing water issues was the raison d'être for the conference, said Henri Rothschild, president and CEO of International Science and Technology Partnerships Canada (ISTPCanada) and the Canada-Israel Industrial R&D Foundation (CIIRDF). The organizations, along with the Edmonton Waste Management Centre of Excellence, hosted the roundtable event "to explore multilateral R&D co-operation in nanotechnology to develop sustainable water solutions."

The meeting was a first step in creating relationships that, it is hoped, will lead to commercial applications of water management solutions. Currently, the global water technologies market is valued at $400 billion, said Rothschild.

Edmonton was chosen to host the gathering as it is known as a centre for nanotechnology development and water expertise, he added.

All the countries represented in Edmonton have started down the road of developing nanotechnology and the meeting permits them to discuss ways of creating long-term relationships, while co-ordinating their efforts so that a structural relationship is created for future co-operation in the field, Rothschild said.

Nano, he explained, refers to a "a whole new way of designing materials and processes at the molecular level.

"The partnerships that emerge from this initiative will exploit the potential of nanotechnology and stimulate the collaborative development and commercialization of new water technologies that benefit many nations," Rothschild said.

"As Canada's flagship nanotechnology institute, we are delighted to help transform this multilateral vision into tangible water solutions that can be deployed around the world," said Nils Petersen, director general of the National Institute of Nanotechnology of the National Research Council.

"This initiative leverages Canada's internationally recognized expertise, facilities and resources in nanotechnology and promises to increase our contribution to novel products that could fundamentally change the way we steward our water resources."

Yaosheng Zhou, deputy director-general of the administrative committee of the Yangling Demonstration Zone in Yangling, China, said 52 per cent of China's territory is either arid or semi-arid.

The roundtable participants already have "good technology that could be deployed in China, but there is also a need for future co-operation for the next generation technology," Zhou said, speaking through an interpreter.

China's current priorities are "sustainable water management" and "waste-water management. With growing economic activity and population growth, it's a big priority for [us]."

Zhou said China, Israel and Canada have already developed a good three-way relationship in developing agricultural technology, and he noted China already employs Israeli-developed drip irrigation techniques.

(Last week The CJN reported that representatives of Canada, Israel and India met in Toronto at the Trilateral Roundtable on Water Technologies to support Canadian and Israeli partners who develop commercially ready solutions for specific Indian projects that can also be applied in a global market.)

Vilenski said for the four-country program to work, several issues have to be resolved: there must be practical co-operation that takes ideas from the research lab and makes them commercially viable, there must be trust between the parties and agreement over who owns the intellectual property behind innovative technologies, there should be agreement over sources of payment for the programs and they must be quick to market with whatever solutions are devised.

While each of the parties expects to benefit economically from the development of new water technologies – he expects the price of water desalination could halve due to new methods – Israel can benefit in a unique way, Vilenski continued.

Israeli President "Shimon Peres has said if we have enough water in Israel, the peace process will move faster," Vilenski said. "Israel does not have enough water to share with its neighbours. If we're able to desalinate water and purify waste water and share with our neighbours, that gives more value to the peace process."

Hockey player publishes his first book at 18

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Zach Hyman has always been a pretty good hockey player. Back in Grade 9, playing for the CHAT Tigers, he was elevated to the senior team, skating alongside kids in Grade 12.

Around the same time, maybe even earlier, he was developing a different talent: he wrote a children's story that won first place in a short story contest and that drew lots of encouragement from his teacher.

He's been pretty busy ever since. He pursued his hockey career as a forward with the Hamilton Red Wings of the Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL), and last summer he was taken in the fifth round of the NHL entry draft by the Florida Panthers. More recently, the talented 18-year-old saw his first book published, Hockey Hero, based on that middle school story.

One online review called it a "touching tale of a grandfather's and grandson's love for each other and hockey [that] is bound to melt the hearts of all ages. This is a classic tale that earns its place on any family's book shelf, coffee table or night stand."

'Education is always important but I really think I have a chance at making the NHL'

Not bad for a kid barely out of high school. It appears that when Hyman does something, he does it at the highest level.

Last week he was back at his old haunts for a book reading. With his Panthers jersey in tow and Billy Idol bleached blonde hair – a playoff ritual the Red Wings employed this season – he read from his book to excited youngsters at Robbins Hebrew Academy's Beth Tzedec campus during the school's annual book fair. "It's really important for me to help out in the community," Hyman explained.

Aside from the absurdly blonde hair – the guys were too young to grow respectable playoff beards – it appears Hyman's got his head screwed on straight.

An honours student, next season he'll be attending Princeton University, where he'll play for the Tigers in the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC), a division of the NCAA.

He took the current school year off – at least as far as academics is concerned – and spent a lot of time on the ice and the gym. In his third year with the Red Wings, a team owned by his father, he was named to the Ontario Junior Hockey League's (OJHL) North-West Conference First All-Star Team. The honour came after he finished second in OJHL scoring with 102 points in 43 games. Hyman, the team captain, had 42 goals and 60 assists and only 24 minutes in penalties.

Last November, he was a member of the silver medal winning Team Canada East at the World Junior 'A' Challenge in Penticton. He scored two goals and three assists in five tournament games.

Those are pretty heady highlights in so young a career – almost as impressive as his Grade 9 MVP performance that led the CHAT Tigers to the TDCAA finals that year.

Hyman believes he's a much better player than the one selected by Florida in the draft last summer, let alone the one who played for CHAT a few years ago.

"I improved my skating, I'm a lot faster," he said. "I got a lot stronger. This last year I was in the gym a lot."

Robert Turnbull, head coach, general manager and president of the Red Wings, said Hyman "is an all-round player. He was sought out by several teams in the 'O' [Ontario Hockey League] and the U.S. Hockey League. I'd say no less than five teams in our league wanted us to trade him to them."

What makes Hyman such a valuable commodity is his broad assortment of skills. "He's a good playmaker and shooter, he's strong on the puck and a good skater. He sees the ice incredibly well and has a good deal of tenacity," Turnbull said.

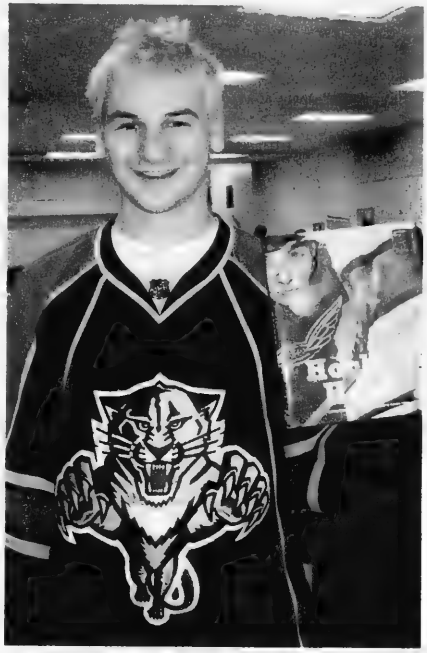
The season started early for the 6-1, 195-pound forward. Hyman attended the Panthers' rookie camp last summer in Coral Springs, the team's training facility. He felt good about his performance and "management said I did really well. They were happy with the way I did, and they expect me to keep developing as well at Princeton. When I'm ready, they'll take me in."

He's in regular e-mail contact with Brian Skrudland, the ex-Panther who's now the team's director of player development, who provides him with tips on improving his game.

Turnbull believes that while Hyman has been a good player for a long time, moving him from wing to centre at the beginning of the season "freed him up. It allowed him to become a better playmaker."

He also got Hyman to change skates from a stiffer boot to a more flexible one. That along with Hyman's dedication – "he worked every day on his skating" – made a big difference.

"His skating skills improved 100 per cent," Turnbull said. "His balance, his leverage. You can't knock him off the puck."



Zach Hyman

As a result, he excelled. "He had more points per game than anybody in the league." Had he not played for Team Canada East and missed games because of the High Holidays, he probably would have won the league scoring title, Turnbull said.

If Hyman's able to make the move to the NHL, he won't be the only Princeton Tiger to do so. Three other Tigers have made the jump, including Jeff Halpern, class of '99, who now skates for the Montreal Canadiens.

Hyman is committed to a four-year stint playing for Princeton, where he's confident he'll continue to develop as a player.

"Education is always important," he said, "but I really think I have a chance at making the NHL."

And what will he study while he's at Princeton? "I don't know," he replied, "maybe something to do with writing."

Arab scholars on Israel are lacking, academic says

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Though Israel possesses few natural resources, it has a surfeit of experts on the Arab world. If Israel is to survive in a hostile neighbourhood, it must know its enemies.

By contrast, neighbouring Arab states sorely lack a corps of scholars and analysts possessing a deep and sophisticated knowledge of Israel.

To Hassan Barari, a professor of Middle Eastern politics at the University of Nebraska in Omaha, the Arab elite's limited understanding of Israel is not only a fact of life but a national shortcoming. He expounds on this thesis in a refreshing book, Israelism: Arab Scholarship on Israel, a Critical Assessment (Ithaca Press).

"Israelism" is a word Barari coined to refer to the Arab style of writing on Israel. It is, he says, shaped by "a set of ideas and misconceptions" rooted in anti-Israel ideologies and influenced by the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"The outcome of Israelism is the failure to produce sound knowledge on Israel," he explains. "Subordinating writing on Israel to the imperatives of the conflict has proved costly."

Barari, a Jordanian, has not fallen into that trap. Although he is proud to be an Arab and is critical of Israel's policies, he is open to other people and their viewpoints. He studied Hebrew at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and has steeped himself in Israeli politics, history and culture. Indeed, he describes himself as "a big fan" of the Israeli novelist Amos Oz.

Better still, he strongly believes in peaceful coexistence and reconciliation between Israel and the Arabs.

Acknowledging his interest in studying the Middle East from "an even-handed and unprejudiced perspective," Barari says he was determined to "go beyond the intellectual confines of pan-Arabism and attempt to see things as they truly are." He brings this dispassionate sensibility to Israelism, which is, as he correctly asserts, long overdue.

In his view, Israeli studies in the Arab world have never "properly taken off," not least because its practitioners have substituted "indoctrination for scholarship" and have sought to expose rather than to understand Israel. Such Arab scholars, he adds in a withering aside, have lacked basic skills: Hebrew language competency and significant residency in Israel.

Barari empathizes with them. As he observes, "I am aware that it is not easy for scholars to visit and stay in Israel. The problem is related to a wider issue: normalization. Many intellectuals in Egypt and Jordan were blacklisted and on some occasions kicked out of their associations for daring to visit Israel."

In a relatively brief survey of Israeli studies in Arab countries, Barari says that Arab expertise about Israel was in very short supply when the 1948 Arab-Israeli war broke out. "The few studies that did appear were meant to mobilize [Arabs] and present Israel as a fragile society that would collapse with the first bullet," he writes in a scathing condemnation.

He adds, "Until 1967, there were no worthy studies on Israel in the Arab world."

Israel's victory in the Six Day War humiliated Arabs and made them realize that their ignorance of Israel was not to their benefit.

In 1968, the Palestine Liberation Organization created the Center for Palestinian Studies in Beirut. Its objective was to publish monographs on the Arab-Israeli conflict and Israel.

Two years later, during the War of Attrition, Cairo University expanded its comparative government course by including material on Israel's political system. Al-Ahram, the Egyptian daily newspaper, then established the Center for Political and Strategic Studies, whose purpose was to study Israeli and Palestinian societies.

In 1977, similar academic institutions were opened in Jordan and Lebanon. After the Oslo peace talks got under way in 1993, the University of Jordan, Barari's alma mater, established an Israeli studies department. In 2000, when the second Palestinian uprising erupted, the Palestinians established the Palestinian Center for Israeli Studies.

(Whether by design or omission, he never tells a reader whether such institutions have sprung up in key Arab nations like Syria or Iraq.)

Although Barari sings the praise of a number of these institutions, and singles out Arab scholars who have done good work in this field, he suggests that Arab scholarship has fallen short, having focused on "elements" that reinforce the Arabs' "perception of Israel."

Israeli studies in the Arab world are hobbled by two misconceptions, he notes. The first one is that Israel is an "artificial entity." The second is that Israel will inevitably disappear. As a result, Arab scholars do not, in general, bother studying Israel with sufficient rigour.

Arab scholarship thus remains "hostage to ideology and the persistence of the conflict," which in turn leads to myths concerning Israel.

Arab journalists are also victims of this syndrome. "Writing on Israel, particularly in the press, has become a means to struggle or fight against Israel and mobilize the masses, rather than explaining and understanding the country."

Yet another problem is that Arab scholars all too often work in non-democratic environments. "Freedom of expression... is limited," he says. "For this reason, objective writing has frequently fallen victim to censorship."

He elaborates on this important theme: "The lack of political and academic freedom and the existence of repressive authoritarian regimes, coupled with the perpetuation of the Arab-Israeli conflict, have informed writing on Israel. It has been influenced by politics and the need to make polemical rather than academic points.

"Arab scholars have not yet managed to match their Israeli counterparts in challenging the official and ideological narratives of the Arab regimes, as the 'new historians' did in Israel. Much of the writing is non-scholarly... and relies on collective memories and much less on critical scrutiny of the era or event."

In addition, he says, Arab governments do not allow researchers into state archives.

In closing, Barari writes that the Arab-Israeli conflict, combined with the Arab perception that Israel is an aggressive state, hinders Arab scholars from embarking on "a process of critical reflection on Israel."

As he puts it, "It is hard for Arab scholars to write on Israel with any kind of detachment. Detachment and impartiality could help [them] see things as they are."

True enough.

Female cartoonists shed light on human frailties

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

Sometimes you have to separate the women from the boys.

A unique art exhibit in Toronto does just that.

Graphic Details: Confessional Comics by Jewish Women is a four-room display at the Gladstone Hotel in Toronto, being hosted by the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

It's the first exhibit of its kind in Canada, showcasing the niche work of 18 Jewish women who are "underground" comic artists, producing alternative-style comic books and graphic novels.

These are not the mainstream, typical comic book renderings in the mould of Wonder Woman and Superman. Instead, the art on display is, as the title of the exhibit states, confessional by nature, deeply emotive, self-deprecating and unafraid to shed light on the artists' frailties as human beings.

Exhibit curators Michael Kaminer and Sarah Lightman spoke to The CJN just before the launch of the show on Feb. 17.

Kaminer, a Montreal native and art collector who's now living in New York, where he works as a journalist, said he felt Toronto was a natural fit for the exhibit. He cited the city's "active comic book scene," which he has come to rely on in his own pursuits.

"Comics as an art form, cartoons [in general] are undervalued. There's the text, the images... it's not just about 'drawing pictures,'" Kaminer said, adding that it's still necessary in today's day and age to elevate women artists because there is still "a bit of a boys' club mentality in this [art] world. It's important to acknowledge the women."

Lightman, herself a cartoon artist, concurred, noting that this exhibit will help women realize that the world of comic art might actually speak to them as well.

Both Lightman and Kaminer brushed off the idea that the show and the art could be considered self-absorbed.

"It's not navel-gazing. It's not masturbatory. We have cartoons dealing with neuroses, miscarriages, universal [women's] themes that were born out of the artists' experiences," Kaminer said.

"There's a lot of truth in these works. All these artists deserve a much wider audience."

Many of the works now hanging on the Gladstone's walls have never been on public display before, Lightman said, adding that the whole exhibit traces the history of Jewish women's voice in the genre from the early 1970s through to present day.

Canadian, Israeli, American and European artists have their works on display at the exhibit, and many will be coming in to give readings and talks about their art over the coming month.

Filmmaker unravels night cook's strange, tragic life

Jordana Divon
Special to The CJN

He holds court behind the counter at the run-down greasy spoon Vesta Lunch, doling out souvlaki and stories about his rebellious youth in Prague, his cats (whom he adores) and his mother-in-law (whom he doesn't).

You may have even grabbed a stool at the Toronto diner, on Dupont Street, after a late night out, and started chatting with the world-worn but craggily handsome George Golias, and wondered how a charismatic, educated, multilingual 66-year-old ended up slinging 3 a.m. poutine to a motley crew of drunken urbanites and insomniacs.

That question is what prompted Jay Irving, then a 23-year-old film student at Humber College, to pick up his camera and spend the next two years unravelling the mystery of Golias' strange, tragic life.

His efforts have resulted in The Night Cook, a gripping documentary set to air at 9 p.m. on March 9 on TVO.

"My friend had dragged me to the Vesta after a party and George was serving us," recalls Irving from an uptown coffee shop. "So when he told me he was just a cook I was like, how is that possible? You could tell right away how smart he was. He was just juggling everything."

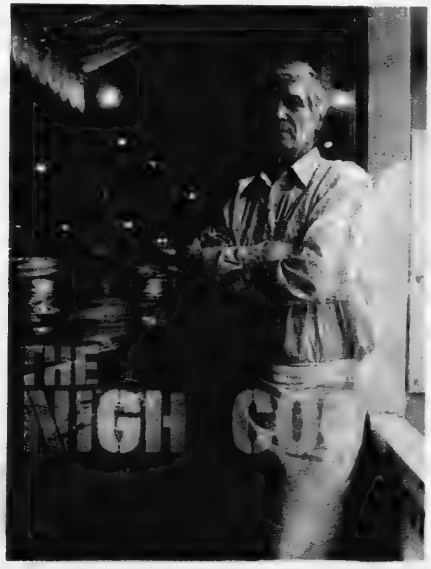
Irving's curiosity yielded some startling answers.

"I started asking him about his life, how he ended up in this job. I thought why is this guy living by himself behind the diner where he works? Why hasn't he spoken to his family in 37 years? Why does he have all these cats? The more I got to know him, the more I wanted to reunite him with his family and make a film out of it."

Gaining access to Golias' personal life involved its share of challenges, beyond any initial trust issues.

"It was really difficult getting a hold of [Golias] because he doesn't have a phone or computer, or even a credit card," says Irving.

"He goes to this off-track betting where he gambles on horses. So he's either there or he's at Future Bakery [a café], where he hangs out, or he's working. I always had to track him down."



A cook at an all-night diner, George Golias is the subject of the documentary The Night Cook.

Irving's patience paid off. Golias proved a fascinating and willing subject, allowing the camera inside the dirty one-room apartment he shares with dozens of cats, and discussing everything from his gambling problem, the abandonment of his wife and baby daughter, and why he hasn't returned home since 1968.

"I think it was therapeutic for him," says Irving. "He's an emotional person, so he cries a lot and often broke down. But it was therapeutic more than anything else."

Those looking for their own catharsis may find themselves challenged and uncomfortable by the film. The documentary's strength comes from Irving's decision not to sentimentalize his subject, but to present a portrait of raw, flawed and poignant humanity.

Whether you like Golias at the end of the hour you spend in his world is less important than the fact that you've engaged with him on his level. And even though his story is only one of a thousand similar tales of city life, a chance encounter has led to the preservation of its meaning.

"I want people to take away that here's an ordinary person on the fringes of society and he has an incredible life, and here's me, this film student who just took the initiative to go make a film about him," says Irving.

"When he dies, this film will always exist. Otherwise no one will know about him. That for me means more than anything."

ACTOR CAYLE CHERNIN REMEMBERED FOR ROLE IN GOIN' DOWN THE ROAD

Cayle Chernin, who appeared in the seminal Canadian film Goin" Down The Road (1970) and worked on several Jewish arts-related projects over the course of her acting and filmmaking career, died in Toronto on Feb. 18. She was 63.

Chernin, along with director Don Shebib and actor Jayne Eastwood and others, had recently completed work on Down the Road Again, a sequel to Goin' Down the Road that was produced largely thanks to her enthusiastic powers of persuasion.

Stricken with ovarian cancer, she kept her illness a secret on the set until cast and crew wrapped up filming last October. She also declined essential medical treatment, preferring to spend her remaining time making the movie, which is expected to be commercially released in 2011.

She appeared in numerous live theatre productions over the years and made cameo appearances on various television shows, including Little Mosque on the Prairies and Queer as Folk.

Finding and visiting some long-lost relatives in Belarus in the early '90s, she made a personal documentary of the experience and showed it to the Jewish Genealogical Society of Toronto about 1992. The film later aired on regional CBC stations in Atlantic Canada and Vancouver as Uncle Boris and My Russian Relatives.

She also produced and directed In the Shadows: The Tragedy of Syrian Jews, an award-winning documentary that was televised in Israel and other countries. Between acting gigs, she conducted video workshops and spent a year making in-house videos for Baycrest. She was a co-chair of the women's committee of ACTRA, the actors' union, and belonged to its Act Your Age group.

She was born into the large Chernin family of Glace Bay, N.S., where her grandfather had built a successful business, L.R. Chernin and Sons Wholesale. Her family moved to Stephenville, Nfld., when she was six and to Toronto when she was 12.

As she related in an online blog after Dennis Hopper died in 2010, she had a brief relationship with the drug-addled actor during what she called her "foolish period" in Hollywood in the early '70s. However, she fled his New Mexico retreat one night following "a terrifying, frightening beating from a freaked-out, insane, spewing lunatic."

Toronto actor Allan Price directed Chernin in a female version of The Odd Couple in the '90s and acted with her in Talk 60 to Me, a show at Theatre Passe Muraille. "She was wonderful to work with, a very generous actor, very smart, and she took direction well," he said.

Chernin leaves her husband, Dwight McFee, mother Beryle Chernin, and siblings Franky Chernin, Barbara Chernin and Nancy Chernin.

Inside Hana's Suitcase: The documentary Inside Hana's Suitcase, made by Rhombus Media, airs on CBC television on Sunday, March 6, 8 p.m. Based partially on the bestselling children's book by Karen Levine of Toronto the film recounts the poignant story of George and Hana Brady, two Jewish children in wartime Czechoslovakia. It also tells the present-day story of a group of Japanese children and their teacher who delved into the mystery of Hana Brady after receiving an old battered suitcase with her name on it from the Auschwitz death camp. The Coens' credits include the Academy Award-winning noirish crime thrillers Fargo (1996) and No Country for Old Men (2007). Also listed in their extensive filmography is the violent cult film Miller's Crossing (1990), Barton Fink (1991), The Big Lebowski (1998), A Serious Man (2009) and the current dark western-adventure, True Grit (2010).

The prize is awarded annually for outstanding achievement in the categories of past, present and future time dimensions. The Coens won in the present category "for their ability to tell a simple story in a complex manner." The award ceremony takes place May 15 at Tel Aviv University.

March 2-13, 2011

This world première comedy introduces us to two secular Jewish families: the Canadian-born Liebermans and their new Israeli neighbours, the Noys. Differences of mentality and mannerism lead to tension, but when their children fall in love with each other and discover Judaism, the parents find that they have much more in common than they thought.

SHAKESPEARE IN ACTION

A black comedy from Mexico

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Mariana Chenillo's comedy from Mexico, Nora's Will, is suffused with black humour.

Death is not normally a subject that lends itself to laughter, but in this film, Chenillo breaks the rule.

Scheduled to open at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Cinemas and the Rainbow Cinemas at the Promenade Mall on March 4, Nora's Will unfolds over five days in an sedate neighbourhood in Mexico City on the eve of and during Passover.

In the first few frames, the camera pans on Nora Kurtz (Silvia Mariscal), a fastidious woman whose face is left unseen. She is a busy lady as she sets a festive table and fills the shelves of a fridge with fine holiday food.

Nora wants to leave everything to be in perfect order, down to the very last detail, so that her guests will enjoy her Passover repast.

Nora will never enjoy the fruits of her labour, nor will we ever hear her voice. Several minutes into the movie, she is dead, having committed suicide on her 14th attempt. Chenillo makes no attempt to explain Nora's chronic state of depression.

Although Nora has passed from this world, she remains a constant presence in the film through flashbacks. Her former husband, Jose (Fernando Lujan), who has been summoned to her apartment after her death, recalls the life they once had when they were young.

Being an atheist whose respect for Jewish tradition is non-existent, Jose orders floral arrangements, as well as a funeral service, from the Cemetery of Jesus.

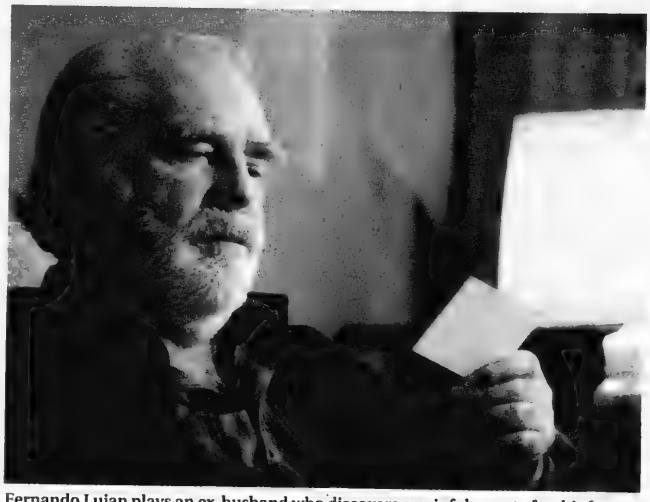
The rabbi (Max Kerlow) is none too pleased by Jose's sacrilegeous behaviour. To add insult to injury, Jose offers the rabbi a slice of pizza slathered with ham.

In his haste to bury Nora – who lies on dry ice under a blanket in the living room – Jose clashes with Moises (Enrique Arreolola), an earnest shomer and convert to Judaism who has been hired to sit with her.

Moises advises Jose to postpone the burial until his son, Ruben (Ari Brickman), returns from an overseas trip with his family.

As per Nora's instructions, Fabiana (Angelina Pelaez), the housekeeper, begins assembling the Passover meal. When no one is looking, Fabiana deposits a crucifix on Nora's chest.

More drama ensues when the rabbi decrees that Nora cannot be laid to rest in a Jewish cemetery because of the manner in which she chose to leave this vale of tears.



Fernando Lujan plays an ex-husband who discovers a painful secret after his former wife's death.

An irreverent touch is added when Ruben's two young daughters practise lying in Nora's casket.

And a painful secret of the heart is revealed when Jose rummages through Nora's bedroom drawers and stumbles upon a compromising photograph.

Nora's Will, replete with emotional twists and turns, examines the human condition and finds it wanting in some crucial respects.

Israeli peewees defend championship in Quebec

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

The peewees from Israel did it again.

The hockey team of 10-to-13-year-olds from Bat Yam defended its divisional championship at the Bernières-Saint-Rédempteur (BSR) International Peewee Tournament in suburban Quebec City.

Israel handily won the Division B gold medal in the finals Feb. 20, defeating Husky5-Chaudière Ouest 6-1, thanks in large part to a hat trick by Dan Boudnikov and outstanding play by goalie Tommy Hawey, who was named player of the game.

Bat Yam was the surprise Division B champion at last year's BSR tournament, the first time an Israeli hockey team at this level played competitively in North America.

The day before, the boys in blue beat Husky2-Chaudière-Ouest 7-1 in semifinal action. David Levin, a stellar performer throughout the tournament, netted four of those goals.

Bat Yam won its three regular games by similarly wide margins. All of its opponents were Quebec teams. The first match Feb. 14 was against fellow finalist Husky 5-Chaudière Ouest, considered strong contenders, but the Israelis subdued them 6-1.

On Feb. 16, the Israelis played two games. In the first, they trounced C.D.I.D St. Prosper 9-1, and then went on to outscore the Seigneurs Lotbinière 7-3. Division B had 20 contenders.

Bat Yam's manager, Quebec City resident Jonathan Hawey, Tommy's great-uncle, was amazed at how well the team performed.

"We lost eight players from last year, and were supposed to be a weak team this year," he said.

If it wants to enter next year, the Bat Yam team will have to move into a higher division. The one above is Division A, but Hawey thinks the Israelis could make it into the bottom of the elite, Division CC.

This was the 36th edition of the BSR tournament, which drew 96 teams from Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the United States, Finland, France, the Czech Republic, Slovakia and Switzerland.

The Israelis were coached by Dimitry Gromkov, who spent two months in Quebec in 2009 upgrading his skills with Lévis's Midget AAA team Les Commandeurs, an exchange that Hawey, a Lévis resident, arranged.

In addition to Bat Yam, which is south of Tel Aviv, team members came from Rishon Lezion, Nes Ziona, Maalot and Kfar Saba, which all have clubs that play in the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel.

Peewee is the youngest level of organized hockey in Israel and is still in its infancy. This was not an all-star team, Hawey said. The players came from different clubs because their numbers are so few.

Centre David Levin, who appropriately wears No. 99, racked up both the most goals (12) and most points in the division.

Hawey said the 11-year-old has come out of nowhere. "I think he played only inline hockey before now," he said.

Bat Yam's participation in the BSR tournament is due largely to Hawey, a past president of Quebec City's sole synagogue and a scout for the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. He has also been a key figure in the development of ice hockey in Israel and in arranging financial support for the team while in Canada – though he's seeking help in covering a $5,000 shortfall.

Hockey event to support Reena Birthright program

Compiled by CJN Staff

The first ever Joel Schwartz Memorial Hockey Tournament in support of the Reena Birthright Israel Program will get underway March 13 at Chesswood Arena.

More than 120 players on 12 teams are expected to take part in the fundraiser. Proceeds will go to the Joel Schwartz Memorial Endowment Fund at the Reena Foundation, which will support the pairing of individuals with developmental disabilities with Reena "shadows" who will accompany them on Birthright trips to Israel.

Teams are responsible for raising at least $2,000 toward the cost of sending one Reena client on Birthright. Corporate and individual team sponsors are expected to cover the remaining amount.

Spectators are invited to the arena to watch the games and participate in interactive events, including a one-hour skate starting at 6 p.m., entry into a raffle and other fun activities.

Schwartz, who died at 25, is remembered as someone defined by genuine kindness and an unrelenting desire to help those around him. His parents, Larry and Julie, said "half his brain worked like a rocket scientist and the other half just didn't work."

Despite his disability, Joel graduated from high school, had a bar mitzvah. He was an air cadet and community volunteer, camper and counsellor and worked at A-Way Express and B&S Delivery.

He participated in a visit to Israel as part of the Reena Birthright Israel Program. His experience on Birthright "is the inspiration for the creation of the [tournament]," tournament organizers said.

"The experience that Joel gained from participating on that trip was truly monumental for him, and as parents, it was with great pride and joy that we were able to send Joel on such a venture with the confidence he was in good hands," his mother said.

Mom's cancer death spurred woman to action

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Amy Elmaleh lost her mother and uncle to colon cancer, she and her aunt formed Colon Cancer Canada in order to make something positive out of the tragedy.

She was 19 when her mother died at age 47, and shortly afterward, her aunt's husband was diagnosed.

She said that after her uncle got sick, she and her aunt, Bunny Schwartz, decided that something had to be done.

"We had the idea for a walk/run and called it Colon Cancer's Push for Your Tush. We're now organizing our 15th annual run."

This year, she said, seven different locations have signed on throughout May and June, with the Toronto run taking place May 29.

"We started with one location, and last year, 1,200 participants raised $318,000."

With the success of the walk/run, Elmaleh said, they decided nine years ago to launch a gala, and then started a golf tournament, to be held this year on May 17 at Angus Glen Golf Club. "We're excited that Anne Murray has signed on as the face of the tournament. She was looking for a charity that needed a celebrity's support."

Interviewed at her Leslie Street office, Elmaleh, 35, said that the effects of colon cancer are far reaching, "but people aren't talking about it. There is still a lot of stigma, and hesitation about the test."

A wife and mother with three young children, Elmaleh said that her work is her passion. "When my mother died, I changed my perspective on things. Had she been screened, my children would have met their grandmother.

"Her death has also kept me grounded. I'm reminded to appreciate the little things, and it has given me drive and motivation."

'Don't be embarrassed about taking the test'

The walk/run, she said, is "my other baby. It has become family- and friend-oriented, and the teams that come out are [made up of people] very much like me. We're all in it for the same reason."

They are also raising funds through the sale of their "Wendy Bear"being sold in memory of Wendy Sittler, the wife of hockey legend Darryl Sittler. "Wendy was a loyal friend of Colon Cancer Canada as she fought this disease and raised awareness for the cause. The money raised from the sale of the bear will go toward helping terminally ill patients spend time at home with their loved ones."

Elmaleh's message during national Colorectal Cancer Month is to not be embarrassed about taking the test. "It is worse to have [the disease] than to worry about the preparation. It's quite an easy procedure."

For information on any of the events or buying the Wendy Bear, call 416-785.0449 or visit www.coloncancer.ca.

Acrobatic dance teacher trains Billy Elliot cast

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Ruthy Dunec never dreamed that a childhood love of gymnastics would result in her opening a gym and then later working with the cast of the Tony Award-winning musical Billy Elliot.

Dunec is known for developing a children's fitness program called Dance Trix, which helps competitive dancers improve their acrobatic and dance techniques.

When Billy Elliot – about a boy who gives up on boxing to fulfil his dream of becoming a ballet dancer, with a score by pop superstar Elton John – opened in previews in Toronto last month (the official opening was March 1), the producers turned to Dunec for help.

The Toronto production team realized that the cast, which includes 18 children, would benefit from working with an expert who could teach dance and acrobatic techniques in a safe, fun and professional manner.

Dunec, 30, enjoyed gymnastics and dance as a kid. She went to Associated Hebrew Schools and continued her education at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. Her passion for the arts led her to study kinesiology at York University. Since the age of 16, she's taught gymnastics, and she realized she had a flair for working with children and that her students liked her technique.

Ruthy Dunec helps dancers improve their acrobatic and dance techniques.

Her passion for finding a balance between art and fitness led her to take over the ownership of the Steeles West Gym, which offers programs for children. Dunec is the program director of KinderBounce Gymnastics as well as Dance Trix, which are part of an umbrella company called Fit 4 Life.

The producers of Billy Elliot heard about Dunec through the Toronto dance-industry grapevine. When they contacted her, she went through a rigorous interview process, after which she was hired to train eight cast members to do acrobatic tricks.

As someone with lots of experience working with dancers, Dunec understands the types of movements a dancer needs to present themselves properly on stage. She also makes sure the actors are learning tricks safely and are perfecting their dance and acrobatic skills.

"One thing I noticed immediately was that they [the cast of Billy Elliot] are extremely hardworking and talented kids. The show is very demanding physically and they do a lot of different tricks and skills, like doing a round-off off the piano with no hands. If they don't train properly, they could get really injured," said Dunec.

In addition to the eight cast members, Dunec has also been working with the ensemble cast who provide acrobatic elements within the show. She said she's committed to training the Billy Elliot cast – she commutes downtown at least twice a week to work with the actors, teaching them new acrobatic skills, improving their existing skills and making sure they are well trained.

"The kids are very young, ranging from age 12 to 14, which is a major growth time, so if they don't have constant maintenance, they could lose a lot of their skills and sustain injuries, so it's really different from working on a normal Broadway show, because a lot of hard work goes into just keeping these kids at the level they are at," said Dunec.

Dunec "spots" (assists) a girl at her Steeles West Gym.

Although this is her first time working on a Broadway show, it isn't the first time she's been involved with a popular dance production.

Dunec said the stars of So You Think You Can Dance Canada – a Gemini Award-winning TV series that features dancers who compete to win cash, a car and the title of Canada's Favourite Dancer – also frequently train in her gym.

Dunec said she enjoys the challenge of juggling her duties at the gym, the gymnastic programs she runs and working with the Billy Elliot cast.

"Overall, it's been so rewarding. I'm honoured to be working with these kids, and I'm excited about doing this again in the future," she said.

One thing is for sure: she now sees Broadway shows in a new light.

"I've been a big fan of Broadway musical theatre forever, and now that I'm part of the behind-the-scenes crew, I can never really look at a show the same way," she said.

"I've realized all the hard work that goes into putting on such a show, and I know that every word, movement and action took 20 to 30 hours to rehearse."

Dunec loved the experience working on this show and hopes to work on another show in the future.

"Anything I do, I really put in 120 per cent. I'm taking it beyond just teaching the kids acrobatic elements, and I try to stick around afterwards to watch some of their numbers and really understand the purpose of what I'm teaching," she said. "The whole process has just been so exciting and rewarding."

Mr. Right has sailed

Dear Ella,

It's time. I'm finished school, I have a fabulous job and now I'm ready. Unfortunately, I may have missed the boat. Most of my friends are already married. Some already have one or two kids, and here I am just pining for a date.

I joined the usual online dating sites, I've gone the speed-dating route, I've even resorted to dropping in to Home Depot from time to time, but no luck.

I seem to be left with the dribs and drabs of the nebbish crowd. I think Mr. Right has sailed.

All along I thought I had the perfect plan. I didn't want a relationship to get in the way of my career. My parents instilled the value of education in my brothers and I and insisted we concentrate on our studies. My two brothers had no problem finding their wives, but good single men are hard to find.

I'll do anything – just tell me what I'm doing wrong.

Finding Mr. Right

Ask Ella

Ella Burakowski

Dear Finding Mr. Right

Your life plan has worked up till now, because it required only your discipline and determination to fulfil your goals. To achieve your next goal, the control is not yours alone. You need a partner who will accept you as much as you'll accept him.

You've taken a very practical approach and so far have done well meeting your educational and career goals. You should be proud of those accomplishments.

Perhaps finding that perfect mate can't be planned in the same way you planned the other parts of your life. However, you can increase your chances of meeting a suitable guy and enjoying yourself at the same time.

Put yourself out there. Join groups, attend programs offered by different organizations. Try a hobby. Maybe join a writer's group or book club at a library. How about a gym or organized sport such as volleyball, or a walking club. Talk to your neighbours at the park or coffee shop, or at garage sales. Be open to blind dates from people you trust.

Above all, you need to truly be open-minded, less judgemental and willing to try. Are you turned off immediately because he doesn't look like Tom Cruise or he dresses like a dweeb? Have you given him a chance to show you what makes him tick, how he thinks, what kind of morals and interests he has, or how he behaves when he's not nervous? When you meet someone while doing something you both like, the mood and expectations are different. You both get to see each other in real life.

Remember that after 10 years, a man may not have the thick head of hair you were once attracted to, but he might be your perfect partner.

Online dating might work for some, but dating profiles are like advertisements. Their purpose is to look and sound as good as possible, often at the cost of the truth. As for speed dating, how much can you possibly find out about a person in three minutes when you're both trying so hard to be wonderful?

You need to relax and do things you enjoy in a social environment. It will fall into place. Just let it happen

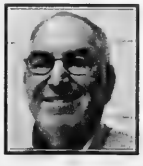
The ties that bind

The woman was kneeling next to my aunt in California at a family bar mitzvah that my sister and I were attending.

Much of our family had migrated over the years to California from our roots in New York, and attending a family affair was part of our commitment to keep our family ties alive.

I had been out there a year earlier to see my aunt, my late father's only sister, since she had moved with her husband from their apartment in Queens, N.Y., to a lovely retirement home closer to two of her daughters who had made that move years before.



Senior Side of Life

Michael Gordon

The simchah was a mini-reunion that confirmed for me the importance of maintaining family ties as I reconnected with various cousins and their families.

After the services and the brunch in the morning and early afternoon, we were at the large party during which the family could share in the fun and "reconnections" and the bar mitzvah boy could experience his new status with his friends. The elders in the family enjoyed watching the children being entertained, and sharing their pre- and just-post-pubescent joys and silliness was fun for those of all ages.

The woman kneeling next to my aunt was writing furiously on a napkin as my aunt reeled out the names and relationships that this woman was thirsting to know about. While speaking, my aunt pointed to my sister and me and various cousins as the connections to the names on the napkin were clarified.

The woman then came to my sister, me and a cousin and asked for further clarification. As we examined the napkin, I realized that it contained a summary of my family's roots and ties, and on this fragile piece of paper were generations of life and history that contained the blood ties that kept us connected, even though generations had passed and geography had caused major disruptions and separations.

The woman, probably of the age of my older children, pulled us over to her father, whom I had never met before but who clearly had a connection as a close friend of my father's family. His daughter introduced us and explained who we were as she referred to the napkin.

His face beamed as names of my father's family were mentioned that clearly resonated with his memory. He told us anecdotes about various members of our family that filled in some of the gaps in our own knowledge of them.

I encouraged the young woman to transcribe the napkin onto something more robust. We exchanged e-mail addresses in case further information had to be shared.

She had a young toddler daughter, and as I looked at them together, I realized just how strong the bonds of family are and how important it is to fit our past into our present to help define who we are, where we came from and why we are connected. The old dictum that "blood is thicker than water" made sense to me.

I learned later that the daughter of my dear aunt's second daughter was also doing a family tree. Her grandmother has been the repository of family history. With the documentation now being prepared, we hope to maintain a record of all those family ties that bind that enhance that "thickness" that comes with blood relationships.

New IDF defence system protects tanks

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

The Israel Defence Forces Armored Corps used a new defence system to intercept an antitank missile fired from Gaza last week.

The antitank missile was fired at a Merkava 4 tank March 1 from Gaza, near Kibbutz Nir Oz in the western Negev, on the Israel-Gaza border.

The armoured protection system Meil Ruach, or Windbreaker, automatically identified the RPG antitank missile in the air, calculated its ballistic course and intercepted it in seconds.

This successful interception of an antitank missile for the first time in real battle conditions makes the IDF and its armoured corps better equipped and better prepared for future challenges in the field of battle.

The Windbreaker, known as ASPRO, or Armored Shield PROtection, is capable of simultaneously identifying multiple launches from different ranges and angles and intercepting them.

Produced by the IDF's Rafael Advanced Defense Systems Ltd., Windbreaker is being marketed outside Israel under the name Trophy. The system uses sensors and radar to identify incoming missiles and dispatches interceptor missiles that neutralize the hostile weapons before they can strike.

The tactical lessons from the Second Lebanon War in 2006 demonstrated the urgent need to proceed with the Windbreaker system and accelerated its development by the IDF.

The Israeli Armored Corps is in a much better tactical position than it was during the war, having acquired the Merkava 4, which is one of the best tanks in the world, and Windbreaker.

During the war, many Israeli tanks were hit and knocked out by the large-scale launching of antitank missiles by Hezbollah. The deadliest antitank missile Hezbollah used in the war was the Cornet, a dual warhead (tandem design) missile. It penetrated a large number of Israeli tanks, causing many casualties.

Evidence Allowed

OTTAWA — The man accused of a 1980 Paris shul bombing failed last week in a last-ditch effort to have handwriting evidence against him disallowed in his ongoing extradition hearing. Hassan Diab, a former University of Ottawa sociology lecturer, is accused by France of bombing the Rue Copernic synagogue, in which four people died and dozens of others were injured. Since his 2008 arrest, the dual Lebanese-Canadian citizen has said he's a victim of mistaken identity. Diab's lawyer has produced three handwriting specialists to contradict French expert testimony that said his signature matches one in a Paris hotel register. Lawyer Donald Bayne said the evidence would be accepted without question in France. But the judge said that while the French evidence was inconsistent, it would violate extradition agreements to apply Canadian standards to it.

Winnipeg Limmud

WINNIPEG — Limmud: Festival of Jewish Learning is coming to Winnipeg for the first time this week. The event, organized by a number of Jewish groups, including the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, will be held March 12 and 13 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus. Among the presenters are award-winning U.S. journalist and author Lisa Alcalay Klug and York University Jewish studies professor and CJN columnist Martin Lockshin. The Limmud concept began in England in 1980 and has spread around the world. For details, visit www.limmudwinnipeg.org.

Murder Case Arrest

VANCOUVER — An 18-year-old was arrested Feb. 20 for the murder of 15-year-old Delta, B.C., resident Laura Szendrei in a local park last fall. The teen was attacked Sept. 25 in a wooded area while on her way to meet friends and succumbed the next day to her injuries. There was no indication she was attacked because she was Jewish, the Jewish Independent reported, nor was there any evidence she knew her attacker, who was 17 when the murder occurred and therefore can't be named by law, police said.

More Israelis Pulled From Rubble In N.Z.

WELLINGTON — Two more Israeli bodies were identified in New Zealand, and at least two others remain missing since last month's devastating earthquake.

The dead Israelis, Ofer Levy and Gabi Engel, 22-year-olds from Rehovot, were found in Christchurch March 1 by New Zealand search and rescue personnel, Israeli officials confirmed. The families were notified the same day in Israel.

Israel is now mourning three nationals killed in the Feb. 22 earthquake. The body of 23-year-old Ofer Mizrachi, from Kibbutz Magal near Haifa, was identified Feb. 27 and was returned to Israel for burial.

A two-minute silence was held across New Zealand exactly one week after the disaster. The official death toll has risen to 155, but police are estimating that it could run as high as 240.

A spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy in Wellington confirmed that two other Israelis, reportedly from Dimona, remain unaccounted for, although one was last sighted on the north island. Neither has contacted his family since the quake ripped through the south island's largest city last week.

Meanwhile, two Torah scrolls buried under the rubble of Christchurch's Chabad house were saved last week by a non-Jewish police detective who had heard that the Torahs were buried and dug it out himself.

WORLD

Abuser Sentenced

JERUSALEM — A self-proclaimed rabbi who counselled his followers to commit acts of child abuse and abused children who lived with him was sentenced to 24 years in jail last week. The judge in Jerusalem District Court also ordered Elior Chen to pay damages of $192,000 to his victims, eight children of the woman he lived with, a follower whose husband had given her over to the charismatic leader. He fled Israel for Canada and then Brazil in 2008, and was extradited back to Israel a few months later, after he counselled followers to severely beat and burn the children in order to rid them of the devil. Some were made to drink alcohol and turpentine until they vomited, and to eat their own feces. They were often locked in suitcases and other small spaces.

Mayor lays down Pride parade law

No funding if anti-Israel group included

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

More than $100,000 in city funding for the 2011 Toronto Pride Parade won't be forthcoming if organizers allow an anti-Israel group to take part, Mayor Rob Ford says.

The annual event is almost four months away – Pride Week runs from June 24 to July 4 this year – but Ford has already vowed not to open city coffers for Pride if it lets the controversial anti-Israel group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) march again this year.

"Taxpayers dollars should not go toward funding hate speech," Ford told The CJN last week, making specific reference to QuAIA. He repeated the pledge he made during the mayoral campaign not to fund Pride if QuAIA is allowed to participate.

Pride received $123,807 from the city last year, but in the midst of a noisy debate about QuAIA's participation in last year's march, then-candidate Ford said that as mayor, he would withhold Pride's funding if it let the group march again.

The issue of QuAIA's involvement has been a sticky one for organizers over the last few years. Since it first participated in 2008, the group has been heavily criticized by many in the Jewish gay and lesbian community, as well as in the broader community, for being out of place in a parade that seeks to celebrate inclusivity.

Rob Ford

The loss of city funding would be a blow to Pride Toronto, which emerged from last year's festival with a debt of nearly $110,000 due to alleged financial mismanagement and the loss of a $400,000 federal grant, Xtra reported.

After last year's parade – in which QuAIA's presence was countered directly by Jewish community organizations such as UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee, marching in solidarity with Kulanu Toronto, the Jewish community's main gay advocacy group – deep rifts emerged in Toronto's gay and lesbian community, Pride said.

In an attempt to resolve this issue, among others, Pride Toronto set up a community advisory panel last year comprising nine volunteer members who represented views on both sides of the issue.

The panel was chaired by Rev. Brent Hawkes and held several community forums in an attempt to find consensus on what to do about QuAIA. On Feb. 17, the panel presented its official recommendations. Pride Toronto has since accepted all the recommendations.

The panel did not reach a firm decision on QuAIA's participation, even though the report itself acknowledged that the issue is what sparked the need for the panel in the first place.

Well-intentioned but vacuous

From the editor's desk...

European policy-makers, especially, like to give advice to Israel. To be sure, there is no denying that Israeli policy-makers can use advice. But sometimes the Europeans go beyond advice-giving.

Metaphorically, and sometimes even literally, they wag their fingers smugly, indignantly, or worse, self-righteously in the face of their Israeli counterparts.

One of the most notorious of the European finger-waggers is Carl Bildt, Sweden's current foreign minister and the former foreign secretary of the European Union. Catherine Ashton, the current EU foreign secretary, is herself an expert finger-wagger and delights in dramatic flourishes of the digit in her conversations and press conferences with Israeli diplomats or politicians. Bildt, however, is probably one of the elite waggers.

The Swedish minister was in the region last week offering his wisdom to anyone who would listen. He had just returned from a two-day fact-finding visit to Egypt where, as we know, political life is still unsettled, to use a polite understatement.

The army rules there. Elections are said to be on the way. But no one knows which parties are contending the elections, let alone who is in charge of any of the still-forming parties.

Most people watching events unfolding in Egypt who yearn for democracy and prosperity there are still holding their breath, though hopefully so for the sake of Egyptians and, it must also be said, for the sake of peace in the region, which benefits everyone, including Israel.

Of the situation in Egypt, Bildt said he was "basically optimistic." He does not believe the country would change its peace treaty with Israel or its basic strategic orientation. He cited no evidence for this belief. But we earnestly hope he is correct.

Then, Bildt lapsed into what can only be described as statements so vacuous that they are beneath banal and even too weak for cliché.

"The possibility that exists now for Israel is to sort of make peace not only with rulers of Egypt, but with the people of Egypt," he said. (My emphasis)

The statement of course has no actual, practical or pragmatic meaning. Sovereign nations sign treaties with one another. In the Middle East, it so happens, only one government is a truly elected democratic one and not a cadre of rulers: Israel. Thus the government of Israel – more than 30 years ago – signed a treaty with the government of Egypt, which was then and since, a small group of rulers.

Bildt's statement therefore, has only a metaphorical meaning, i.e, Israel should win the hearts and souls of the Egyptian people. And of course, in his mind, there is only one way of doing that: settle with the Palestinians!

Bildt is not alone in that opinion. Many believe the very same thing. If only Israel and the Palestinians were at peace, the Arab peoples – like Bildt's Egyptians – would be at peace with Israel too. Again, he offers no evidence for the conviction. Nor can he do so, because there is none.

Moreover, based on events currently stirring the Arab world, one can speculate that he is quite wrong.

Recent events might prove that the Arab people – like Bildt's Egyptians – might more likely be at peace with Israel when they are at peace with themselves, namely, with their own situations in their own societies.

When Arab peoples, young and old, of all educational strata, have opportunities to build meaningful, modern lives for themselves and their families, they might then understand that hatred and intolerance are inimical to their own prosperity.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict has never been the central bone sticking above all others in the collective throat of the Arab peoples. Rather, it has been the hopeless, moribund condition of the "ordinary" Arab that has seared the greatest anger and resentment into his heart.

Of course, and it must be emphasized, Israel must indeed do all it possibly can, with a sense of urgency, to find an agreement with the Palestinians. The vast majority of Israelis hold this view, as do the vast majority of Israel's supporters around the world.

But Bildt and all the finger-waggers ignore what cannot be ignored: The Palestinians refuse to negotiate. They are divided. They vie with each other for legitimacy. And legitimacy, the leaders of the respective Palestinians believe, does not come from an equally urgent desire to sit down with Israelis to finally reach agreement. No. Palestinian leaders believe that their legitimacy comes from publicly showing the greatest truculence towards the Jewish state and the greatest reluctance to actually sit down with the Jewish state's leaders to sign an end to the conflict. (See According to Reports in this edition of The CJN.)

Bildt and the finger-waggers are well-intentioned but offer mostly empty advice.

Synagogues lobby PM for clean water for First Nations

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A coalition of Toronto synagogues is addressing First Nations community environmental issues as part of its 2011 tikkun olam outreach activities.

The Bayview Corridor of Synagogues (BCS) consists of six north Toronto congregations of different streams of Judaism: Beit Rayim Synagogue, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Temple Emanu-El and Temple Har Zion.

In January, the BCS screened the film We Live By the River, a documentary about the work of the Alaskan tribal and Yukon First Nations communities to protect their drinking water.

The screening was part of the BCS's ongoing social action and social justice agenda, which includes partnering with native communities across North America to help bring attention to their various plights.

According to Kenneth Stewart, BCS president, that screening elicited a strong reaction from his members.

The screening of We Live By the River prompted the synagogues to send an open letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper on Feb. 4. It asked him to "ensure that indigenous peoples in Canada and their communities are provided with clean and safe drinking water" and urged Harper to "work swiftly and diligently in correcting this tragic situation in Canada."

The letter was signed by Stewart and more than 60 other people, most of whom were on hand to view the film.

The letter also asked that the federal government abide by the Indian Act, which obliges the government to "ensure clean drinking water for indigenous peoples," according to Stewart.

First Nations environmental experts Lorraine Rekmans, left, and Kim Wheatley and Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld address a Bayview Corridor of Synagogues audience.

In the letter, the BCS asked the government to "demonstrate leadership" by working with First Nations communities over the course of the next year to ensure that measures are in place by 2012 "to govern and implement the provision of clean and safe drinking water" for all indigenous peoples.

The PMO has since forwarded the letter to John Duncan, minister of Indian affairs and northern development, and told the BCS that their concerns are being "carefully reviewed."

As part of its outreach, the BCS teamed up with two First Nations experts on environmental issues: Lorraine Rekmans, the aboriginal affairs critic for the Green Party and a band member of the Serpent River First Nation, and Kim Wheatley, the aboriginal program coordinator for the Turtle Island Conservation program at the Toronto Zoo and a member of the Shawanaga First Nation.

Both Rekmans and Wheatley spoke to a BCS audience last month about the environmental problems their peoples faced.

Rekmans told The CJN by e-mail that she wanted the community to know that urban demands are impacting native resources, with drinking water being just one example.

"There are currently more than 100 First Nation communities in Canada that are now under a boil-water advisory. In four decades, we have gone from drinking spring water to not being able to drink the water at all without treating it," she wrote.

Rekmans added: "In addition to lobbying the federal and provincial governments to address drinking-water issues on First Nations lands, the urban citizens must check their demands, and realize the effect their actions have on regions of Canada where resources come from.

"Urban people impact on the lives of the First Nations communities who live near areas where resources are being extracted. The forested regions of Canada are more than a place to get things for lifestyles that some see as decadent," she wrote.

She told the BCS that First Nations communities don't want a "made in Ottawa" solution to local problems.

"We are pushed forth onto the Earth by a flood of water which comes from our mother. Our first lesson on the planet is that water is sacred and it is the source of life," Rekmans wrote.

Wishful thinking yields to prudence

It appears that the United States has decided to fine tune its response to the waves of civil strife rolling across the Middle East. As reported last weekend in the Wall Street Journal, the White House is devising a new Middle East strategy to deal with the ongoing turmoil in the Arab world. The Journal suggested that the Obama administration has now decided to advocate an incremental rather than immediate advance to democracy.

The Journal quoted a U.S. official as saying that "starting with Bahrain, the administration has moved a few notches toward emphasizing stability over majority rule. Everybody realized that Bahrain was just too important to fail."

The fact that the United States has extensive commercial and banking relations in Bahrain and a key naval facility there might have something to do with the administration's new "sure-but- slow" approach to achieving full freedom and democracy for the people of Bahrain.

In this revised policy, one can hear the echo of Israel's observations at the very outset of the popular uprisings in the Arab world. If the United States was moved to urge protesters in Bahrain to be more moderate, how much more was Israel justified in urging the very same in Egypt, with whom it shares interests that are far deeper and far more consequential than banking and a naval port?

The significance of those shared interests was underscored last weekend by an announcement in Sudan by Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based head of the political arm of Gaza's Hamas rulers. Meshal was quoted as saying that the "people in Egypt and Tunisia have given us back our lives." He was referring to a statement by an Egyptian official that the border with Gaza, which former Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak had sealed to prevent arms smuggling into Egypt as well as into Israel, would be slightly unsealed.

"Today we are witnessing Cairo returning to its natural state, after it disappeared from that state for a long time," Meshal said. He was referring to the hope that a future Egyptian regime would join Hamas in its cause.

And to ensure the world did not forget the quite precise nature of his cause, Meshal added. "The first step [to liberating Jerusalem from Israeli occupation] is refusal to negotiate with Israel... and to establish a new, reconciled Palestinian position based on jihad," he said.

To be sure, a democratic regime in every country in the Middle East would be ideal. But wishful thinking is not a substitute for cautious, prudent policy in helping achieve that treasured transition to democracy, away from the despotic, oppressive, vile, autocratic rule in the Arab world today.

25 years ago in The CJN

Former UN secretary general Kurt Waldheim, 67, who was running for president of Austria, faced questions about his activities during World War II. He was accused of being on the staff of a German Army general who was hanged for war crimes and of belonging to two Nazi Party organizations. Waldheim initially denied the allegations, then backtracked in subsequent media interviews.

Israel has always defied the U.S.

There is much debate as to whether U.S. President Barack Obama is the worst president in his attitude toward Israel. He has suggested co-operation with the Arab world and has reached out to Syria and Iran. He has applied incredible pressure on Israel without demanding any reciprocity from the Arab side.

In 1948, the U.S. State Department, the Pentagon and CIA pressured then-Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion to avoid a declaration of independence. In 1950, the United States asked Israel to refrain from Jewish construction in Jerusalem and from declaring Jerusalem as Israel's capital. Ben-Gurion defied the United States and declared Jerusalem as the capital. In 1967, prime minister Levi Eshkol defied U.S. pressure and annexed east Jerusalem, thereby reuniting the city. In 1970, prime minister Golda Meir was urged to relinquish parts of Jerusalem and instead constructed neighbourhoods.

In 1961, president John F. Kennedy pressured Israel to stop the construction of Israel's nuclear reactor. In 1967, president Lyndon Johnson urged Israel not to take a preemptive strike against Egypt, Syria and Jordan. In 1977, president Jimmy Carter pressed prime minister Menachem Begin to abstain from direct negotiations with president Anwar Sadat of Egypt. Israel ignored that directive, and a peace treaty between Egypt and Israel was the result. In 1981, president Ronald Reagan warned Begin against bombing Iraq's nuclear reactor. Again, Israel did what it thought best and crippled Iraq's nuclear capability.

Notwithstanding the anti-Israeli pressure from U.S. presidents, the American Congress has always stood firm in supporting Israel, and this is mainly because the American public stands by a democratic and secure state of Israel. Proof of this is that in 1991, president George H.W. Bush denied Israel's request for emergency assistance. Congress defied him and Israel received cash and military assistance. Israel can still count on a friendly Congress and, therefore, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should follow the precedent set by his predecessors and defy Obama. Israel will still continue to come out on top.

Canada-Israel Committee's work

I wish to bring to two matters to your attention:

1. The article on the United Church task force in Israel failed to mention the invaluable work of my colleagues at the Canada-Israel Committee in putting together the exceptional agenda ("United Church to reassess Mideast policies," March 3).
2. In his letter to the editor, Rabbi Mendel Kaplan states that in my effort to seek "shalom bayit" between him and Kulanu, that he "has yet to hear anything from me" ("Article misses the real issues," March 3). Time to live up to our slogans

Thank you to Rabbi Chaim Strauchler for highlighting the difference between facile sloganeering and an earnest approach to community building ("Is freedom and tolerance really spoken here?" March 3). It seems that we have become so accustomed to the toxic society we live in that the concept of menschlich has no meaning. Perhaps it's time to live up to our slogans.

Settlers accuse Netanyahu of building freeze

Leslie Susser
JTA

Although the 10-month moratorium on building in Jewish settlements in the West Bank was lifted last September, settler leaders complain that no construction is being allowed in the large urban areas and warn that a de facto freeze on all Jewish building in the West Bank is looming.

The settler leaders maintain that the Netanyahu administration is refusing to publish new tenders and that all current building is based on a limited number of permits issued years ago by previous governments.

"It's like a pipeline into which no new water is being pumped," Danny Dayan, chairman of the Yesha Council, the umbrella leadership of the setter movement, told JTA. "Water still comes out on the other side because there is still some inside. But it will soon dry up."

According to Dayan, already there are no major building projects in large West Bank towns such as Ma'aleh Adumim, Ariel and Betar because the Netanyahu government has not published a single land tender for urban construction in the West Bank in the two years it has been in power.

"This has led to the absurd situation in which nearly all the building going on now is by private contractors in small isolated settlements outside the blocs slated to remain in Israel in any future agreement with the Palestinians," he said. "And in the settlements on which there is a consensus, the freeze is still in force."

With plans for more than 4,000 new housing units still awaiting government authorization, the mayors of Ariel and Ma'aleh Adumim recently fired off letters of complaint to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and settler leaders announced that they were considering launching a nationwide "save our towns" campaign.

But according to Peace Now, a group that is against the settlements and monitors construction in the West Bank, the settler claims are grossly misleading.

"Immediately after the freeze was lifted, we saw a flurry of building the likes of which we hadn't seen for years," Peace Now Chairman Yariv Oppenheimer told JTA. "Since the freeze ended, the settlers have begun work on about 1,700 housing units in 67 different settlements."

Oppenheimer acknowledged, however, that the Netanyahu government is withholding permits for new building in the large urban areas. In his view, Netanyahu ended the freeze to please the settlers, but is not issuing new permits to please the Americans.

"It creates a situation in which no one is happy and the national interest is compromised," Oppenheimer said.

In mid-February, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman seemed to confirm that the construction moratorium was still largely in effect.

At a meeting with U.S. Jewish leaders in Jerusalem, Morton Klein, the president of the Zionist Organization of America, asked whether it was true that the government was not issuing new permits in towns like Ma'aleh Adumim and Ariel.

"I am going to answer, like many politicians do – no comment, no comment, no comment," Lieberman replied. "But Morton, we're going to change this."

To some extent Lieberman may have been playing politics. For some time he has been sniping at Netanyahu in a bid to usurp his position as the natural leader of the Israeli right, and last September Lieberman delivered a speech at the United Nations in which he implied that Netanyahu's peace policy vis-a-vis the Palestinians was totally unrealistic.

Also, just a few weeks ago, Lieberman again publicly humiliated the prime minister by shooting down Netanyahu's candidate for the key post of Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, outgoing National Security Adviser Uzi Arad.

Israelis opposed to the government's dismantling of two illegal outposts in the West Bank last week stand near a large poster outside the Prime Minister's office in Jerusalem that depicts Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak brandishing weapons. [Flash90 photo]

The settler claims about a de facto freeze were grist to Lieberman's mill, and it would have been surprising if he had let the chance slip by for another implicit broadside at the prime minister's right-wing credentials while boosting his own.

Nevertheless, it is becoming increasingly apparent that the 10-month moratorium on building and the quiet freeze on new construction permits have not won Netanyahu many points from the international community – so much so that he is now considering launching a new political initiative to redress the balance.

News of this first emerged during an angry telephone conversation in late February with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who accused him of not having done anything to promote peace with the Palestinians.

"There are discussions at the highest level on Israel taking a diplomatic initiative, including the possibility of another major policy speech by the prime minister," a senior Netanyahu aide told JTA. "There is an understanding that we have to take the lead."

The idea is that in what is being dubbed as a "second Bar-Ilan speech," Netanyahu will articulate in greater clarity his vision of peace. If this brings the Palestinians back to the negotiating table, well and good. If not, at least it will show the world that it is the Palestinians who are obstructing peacemaking, not Netanyahu, the aide explained.

The Israeli estimate is that Palestinians will return to the peace table only if they are disabused of the notion that they will be able to achieve their goals through unilateral moves in the United Nations.

"That is why Netanyahu was so pleased with the U.S. veto of the Palestinian-initiated Security Council vote against the building in the settlements and so disappointed with the European decision to go along with it," the aide said.

But will Israel be able to get the Palestinians back to the negotiating peace table without imposing an official new settlement freeze, and is Netanyahu's refusal to grant new building permits a move in that direction?

At a Likud Knesset faction meeting Monday, the prime minister indicated that it might be. Excoriating settler efforts to obtain new permits, he said, "Israel is facing a very difficult international reality" and the settler leaders "don't understand where they are living."

The senior Netanyahu aide told JTA that "The settler community has to understand that the diplomatic struggle isn't over additional building in the settlements, it's over the settlements themselves."

'Day of Rage' supports West Bank outposts

JTA

JERUSALEM — Demonstrators blocked highways and train routes in a "Day of Rage" called by Israeli settler leaders to protest the demolition of illegal structures at a West Bank outpost.

Some 15 demonstrators blocked the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem highway Thursday morning, kicking off what was billed as a day of protests against last week's demolition of structures at the Gilad Farm outpost in the northern West Bank. Burning tires reportedly also were placed on the highway, and several demonstrators blocked train tracks between Ben Gurion Airport and Modi'in.

Later in the week, about 50 activists blocked the road regularly used by both Jewish settlers and Palestinians between the Palestinian cities of Kalkilya and Nablus. Some protesters slashed the tires of a police car at the scene, leading to one arrest, Ynet reported.

Some 20 protesters were arrested blocking an intersection near Ben Gurion airport. Dozens of protesters also demonstrated near Hebron and near the settlement of Binyamin in the West Bank.

Following the razings at Gilad Farm, eight settlers were arrested and 15 wounded as the result of clashes with police. Later, hundreds of right-wing activists blocked roads in Jerusalem, leading to the arrests of some two dozen protesters.

In the West Bank, protesters blocked the entrance to Nablus but allowed through cars driven by Jews. Also, a Molotov cocktail was thrown at a Palestinian home in Hawara, near Nablus, burning a room in the house, and Palestinians from Burin accused settlers from Yitzhar of rolling burning tires toward the village in what are being called revenge attacks.

Settlers said that police used unnecessary force, including rubber bullets and tear gas, in the Gilad Farm evacuation. Israeli Public Security Minister Yitzhak Aharonovitch acknowledged later that police, fearing for their safety, had used plastic bullets.

"The settlers outnumbered the security forces and encircled a small group of officers, posing a concrete threat on the force," Aharonovitch said.

A soldier whose home was razed in the demolition, Shimon Weizman, was dismissed from the Kfir Brigade and sentenced to 30 days in prison after he said publicly that he would not return to military service until his outpost home is rebuilt.

Also last week, Israeli soldiers arrested a Palestinian in possession of a weapon who allegedly was planning an attack on the Yitzhar settlement, Ynet reported.

The empty place where wonder dwelled

While we brag that the crocus and daffodil buds are showing in our gardens in Vancouver, we still suffer days that are grey and gloomy. February days can be depressing, as those who have abandoned Lotusland for Toronto's bright blue winter skies have told us.

Still, dark afternoons give us time to sit by a fire and read books.

On the other hand, there are days like today, as I write this, that I can see the mountains behind the city blissed out with snow, the far slopes looking like frosted cakes. Then our hearts rise.

This sense of wonder at the astonishing nature of nature strikes us at many times: the birth of a child; a volcano rising from the ocean; glaciers calving; sunset over the Judean desert, and hooded kohanim blessing the congregation during Yom Kippur.

It appears – I say this carefully, since no one has been able to confirm this scientifically – that humans are the only creatures to be able to feel and express a sense of wonder.

Our adult education class has been studying writings of the late scholar and master of the mystical, Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel. In a chapter titled simply "Wonder," from his book A Philosophy of Judaism, he writes on that unique ability of humans to feel wonder: "Among the many things that religious tradition holds in store for us is a legacy of wonder." When I read that, my first instinct was to say, "Of course, and I know just what events evoke the sense of wonder." But no. My thinking was too shallow.

We may think that the kind of wonder I described above is the wonder of which Rabbi Heschel speaks. However, his point emerges later: we are to hold within our religious experience the knowledge that the experience of wonder is itself the miracle.

This is very difficult for me to imagine. I understand the feeling of awe that arises when we see a wonder of nature. We have brachot to channel that feeling. From my windows – the same ones that can see the mountains around Vancouver, or when fog rolls in, nothing at all – I often see double rainbows and can pronounce the brachah assigned to that phenomenon.

But to contemplate the thought that the actual religious experience is that I should be radically amazed, in Rabbi Heschel's language, by my sense of wonder, that I can have this emotion bracketed by the brachah, well, that's a different matter.

Part of me clings to the tradition that values the intellect with which we approach discussion of the meaning embedded in the Torah. Using the tools developed by traditional commentators, we rationally dissect a text and its commentaries that have been brought by rabbis over the past 2,000 years.

I'm most comfortable with this approach to text. It challenges our aptitude for concentrating on every nuance of the narrative.

A second approach, however, challenges us to look behind the text, to find what triggers that sense of wonder. For Rabbi Heschel, faith demands the ability to know that we are amazed at the irrational. Neither approach can exist without the other, and both together allow us to savour fully the richness of our heritage.

Further to this idea, Rabbi Heschel writes: "The sense of wonder and transcendence must not become a 'cushion for the lazy intellect.' It must not be a substitute for analysis where analysis is possible; it must not stifle doubt where doubt is legitimate. It must, however, remain a constant awareness if man is to remain true to the dignity of God's creation, because such awareness is the spring of all creative thinking."

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel

In recent weeks, we've been reading about the construction of the mishkan, the tabernacle in the desert. Why pay attention to each detail of its fittings and furnishings? What possible difference can it make to us, 3,000 years later, how many ornamental knobs and flowers or how many gold and brass fittings were needed?

I offer a modest suggestion: that crude centre of worship, trundled around with the tribes for nearly 40 years, was the place where Israelites could develop their sense of wonder. In it, hidden and exposed at the same time, they could find what would arouse in them the ability to experience radical amazement, a place where the presence of the ineffable manifested itself, not in a particular image, but in the absence of an image, in the space between the cheruvim, in the empty place where wonder dwelled.

Is this progress?

In my last year of college, I decided to pursue anthropology. I loved learning about human diversity and cultural differentiation. But as I had just married an Orthodox rabbi, this was not my most practical decision. I was unprepared for other difficulties.

When I asked the head of our department for help in finding funding for graduate school, he refused. Admitting that I was the most qualified student, he explained that I was "just a woman." Although this was the liberated 1960s, it wasn't the only sexism I experienced during my academic career.

I did go to graduate school, securing National Science Foundation support. But my route wasn't direct. There were stops and starts associated with the necessities of a husband's career. I began graduate studies in 1966, not stopping for an MA but taking all the equivalent courses and comprehensive exams in 1968. Due to the shifting nature of my life, I had to redesign my doctoral thesis several times. Eventually, I settled on a topic that I could investigate in Montreal.

Research completed and writing begun, I required more time to complete the task. In 1972, I asked for an extension. My university responded to my request with a resounding "no." Having children and working part time weren't good enough excuses for a delay. My original professor's remarks rang true. His sexism was representative of the system. There was no place in the system for women who couldn't operate as men.

Why am I telling you this today? Haven't we passed all of that? Isn't sexism dead? Well, not really.

Women make up at least half of our students at the college level, but the faculties of most universities are not fully gender equal. Most schools are consciously trying to become more gender balanced. Yet not all departments are so committed, and there still seems to be an old boys' network in some places. But the gender disequilibrium becomes more apparent at the higher levels of university life. How many women are granted the title of full professor? How many top administrators are women? What are the pay distributions?

In Canada, women earn only 79 cents on the dollar compared to men. Women make up 47 per cent of the labour force, but only 17 per cent of corporate officers are female and only 14 per cent of corporate board members are female. Even though women are half of the population, only 22 per cent of the MPs in Ottawa are female. The situation is better in Quebec politics and corporations, but there's no gender equality yet in the world we live in.

We have many statements from politicians, philosophers, human rights advocates and even religious leaders, all committing to some ideal of gender equality. But real, on-the-ground, actual egalitarianism we have yet to see. Anywhere.

Norma Baumel Joseph

in Montreal

If we have made any progress as a society, there are still many venues to investigate. We need to look at our own community. How many of our community presidents and leaders are women? How do our institutions function? Where are our institutions when it comes to lay leadership and equality? Do we pay the same for professional services of male and female workers? Studies indicate that our agencies and federation do not.

According to our tradition, God created male and female equally in the divine image – at the same point in time, with equal intention and equal sanctity (Genesis 1:28). If there are physical differences between men and women, they're not to be exercised by diminishing a person's sanctity or dignity in any way. Our attitude and treatment must reflect human equality and respect for God's image.

How can we avoid the sexism of the workplace or school that I lived with in the 1960s?

Of one thing I am sure. Many believe that we're on a progressive road, that our daughters will have it better than we did. But I'm not so sanguine. In some ways women are in a better place than they were in 1921. But in other ways, we are not as free or as respected as was Asnath Barzani, a 17th-century woman who was head of a yeshiva – in Kurdistan, of all places. I will write about her elevation in my next column.

Harry Truman rallied to the Zionist cause

With Franklin Roosevelt's death in 1945, the United States lost a great president. Harry Truman, his underestimated successor, was suddenly thrust into the limelight. The issues he faced were daunting, least of all the simmering problem in Palestine, which was fiercely contested by Jews and Arabs and administered by Britain under a League of Nations mandate.

As tensions inexorably rose in Palestine, Truman – a former U.S. senator with a pro-Zionist record – was caught up in a political struggle of epic proportions. A Baptist inspired and guided by the Bible, he was emotionally drawn to the notion of Jewish statehood, which the majority of American Jews supported. But as a politician who was duty-bound to take broader U.S. interests into account, he had no alternative but to seriously consider the pro-Arab views of some of his top officials. Consequently, Truman hesitated at crucial moments, confounding both camps.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When push came to shove, Truman acted decisively, with the United States becoming the first country to recognize Israel's independence and sovereignty. It was a pivotal moment in the history of the Middle East and the annals of U.S. foreign policy.

The high drama that consumed the former haberdasher from the state of Missouri is the subject of A Safe Haven: Harry S. Truman and the Founding of Israel (HarperCollins), written by the husband-and-wife team of Allis and Ronald Radosh, who claim that Palestine was "the one constant crisis" of his presidency. Truman's daughter, Margaret, went one step further, saying that Palestine was "the most difficult dilemma of his entire administration."

True enough.

Truman's predecessor, Roosevelt, was supposedly in favour of a Jewish "commonwealth" in Palestine. In actual fact, he pursued a policy of obfuscation, trying to please Arabs and Jews simultaneously. A statement Roosevelt forwarded to the king of Saudi Arabia, Ibn Saud, in 1943 formed the nub of his views: Roosevelt assured him that no decision regarding Palestine would be taken "without full consultation with both Arabs and Jews."

Until then, the United States had no clearly defined policy toward Palestine, generally regarding it as a British responsibility. When Truman assumed office, his only knowledge of what Roosevelt had in mind for Palestine came from his public pronouncements. He had obviously been kept out of the loop.

As a senator, Truman – whose familiarity with the Old Testament attuned him to Zionist longings – signed a resolution calling for "the restoration of the Jews in Palestine." Truman's pro-Zionist inclinations were bolstered by his enduring friendship with Eddie Jacobson, a Jew who had been his partner in a Kansas City clothing store and who, though not a Zionist, was acutely sensitive to the atrocities that had been committed during the Holocaust. Truman's pro-Zionist sentiments, however, crashed up against the State Department, whose preferred policy for Palestine was a British trusteeship under a United Nations charter.

Truman had to deal with the Palestine file after learning of Roosevelt's promise to Ibn Saud, who, like all Arab leaders, staunchly opposed Jewish statehood, and after reading an alarming report submitted by one of his envoys, Earl Harrison, on the plight of 100,000 Jewish refugees, mainly Holocaust survivors, languishing in displaced persons camps in Germany and Austria.

Observing that they lived in grim conditions, Harrison concluded that they wished to be settled in Palestine. Touched by their situation, Truman agreed that they should be allowed to proceed to Palestine. But the State Department, as well as the British government, argued that Palestine lacked the capacity to absorb them.

Bombarded by Jewish appeals on behalf of the refugees, Truman soon grew tired of the intense lobbying. "The Jews," he said in a frisson of exasperation, "have no sense of proportion" and are "very, very selfish."

Meanwhile, Truman had to consider a new report, the Morrison-Grady plan, which called for two partially self-governing Arab and Jewish provinces in Palestine. Truman initially backed the plan, but when Zionist supporters told him that it would result in the creation of "a Jewish ghetto" in Palestine, he had a change of heart and shifted his allegiance to partition. The Arab League rejected the plan outright. The Arabs sought an end to the British mandate and further Jewish immigration, and demanded a unitary state in which Jews would be a protected minority.

With the Morrison-Grady scheme sidelined, Truman lent his support to the majority recommendation of the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine, which called for partition.

The State Department, which advocated a trusteeship, demurred, claiming that partition would undermine American relations with the Arab world, prompt the Arabs to align themselves with the Soviet Union and jeopardize Arab oil supplies.

Not surprisingly, American Zionists pushed for partition. Eddie Jacobson was recruited to persuade his old friend on the merits of partition. "Harry, my people need help, and I am appealing to you to help them," he wrote in a missive.

Harry Truman

It's debatable what impact Jacobson had on the president. What is certain, as the authors contend, is that Truman rallied to the cause of partition after the Arab League threatened to invade Palestine once the British departed. Facing a new reality, the State Department tried to adjust the borders of the proposed two states by placing Safed and the southern Negev in the new Arab state. Eventually, Washington retracted these revisions.

The United States joined 32 other nations, including Canada, in voting for the 1947 UN partition plan, yet Truman was still conflicted. As he put it, "The Jews are bringing all kinds of pressure on me to support the partition of Palestine and the establishment of a Jewish state. On the other hand, the State Department is adamantly opposed to this."

Despite the historic developments at the United Nations, anti-partition forces in the State Department finally prevailed and trusteeship, even if only on a temporary basis, became the United States' new position on Palestine.

But on May 14, 1948, the concept of a trusteeship was rendered irrelevant when David Ben-Gurion announced Israeli statehood. Eleven minutes later, the United States formally recognized Israel on a de facto basis.

Truman declined to lift a U.S. embargo on the sale of arms to the Middle East, a State Department initiative, but the Federal Bureau of Investigation looked the other way and permitted weapons to be smuggled into Israel through U.S. ports.

In addition, Truman immediately agreed to grant Israel's president, Chaim Weizmann, an audience in the White House and vetoed the appointment of an Arabist as Washington's first ambassador to the Jewish state.

Truman announced de jure recognition of Israel on Jan. 31, 1949, and, some four months later, granted the new state a $100-million loan.

Although he was rightly hailed as a friend, Truman upset Israeli leaders by refusing to lift the arms embargo and pressing for a return of Palestinian refugees to their former homes in Israel.

Nonetheless, as the authors observe in this thoughtful and thorough book, Truman has "a place of honour in the history of the Jewish people." They speculate that Roosevelt would not have been as generous in his support as Truman and claim that Israel might not have survived its first difficult years without Truman's assistance.

If you are looking for a home run, forget Romspen.

Since we became clients of Romspen almost 20 years ago we have become very conservative investors. We no longer look for investments that give us a home run. The consistent annual income of 8.4-10.5% from Romspen with interest deposited monthly in our bank account suits us just fine.

The accessibility of the Romspen partners and their personal service is very much appreciated by us. So much so that we have always felt comfortable in encouraging our family and friends to become investors as well.

Meals on Wheels volunteers provide human contact

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Volunteer drivers for Circle of Care's Kosher Meals on Wheels do much more than bring food to clients, says the program's co-ordinator.

"Sometimes they deliver meals straight to the refrigerator and check if the food has piled up. There is also a safety protocol, so if no one answers the door or the client looks unwell, the driver has a procedure to follow," said Inna Dantchenko.

It may be the only human contact a client has all day, she said. "It is so important for an isolated person to have a little visit. We're not a pizza delivery service."

With close to 1,700 meals a week going out to clients, however, they're having trouble getting enough volunteers, she said.

Arnold Foss, director of communications for Circle of Care, said the demographics of volunteers have changed.

"In the '80s, there were a lot of stay-at-home mothers, and people retired at age 65. These were the people who were volunteering. We don't have that base now. They are all working. If we want to keep the program afloat, we need creative ways to volunteer."

He said that people who cannot commit weekly can substitute for a regular driver during summer or winter vacations.

"We also encourage organizations to get involved, so they can send out two people, for example, every week. We're very flexible. If you have any time at all, let us know.

"Recruiting volunteers is our primary need. Food is life, and for some clients, we are the main source of nutrition. Our food comprises about 40 per cent of a person's daily nutrition. If they have eggs, cheese, milk and bread, in addition to our meals, they are basically OK," he said.

David Bergart, a member of Temple Har Zion brotherhood, has been delivering meals for 15 years, and said that he has served a client a meal on a tray if he thinks they wouldn't eat on their own. "I certainly don't drop it and run," he said.

Michael Lewis, a native of Capetown, South Africa, began delivering meals as soon as he arrived in Canada about 4-1/2 years ago. "I was interviewed and had a police check and away I went. It immediately got me involved in the community."

Foss said that with the lack of volunteers, staff and managers have had to deliver meals. "On Fridays, especially, we have our biggest load. We send gefilte fish, challah, horseradish and a sip of wine."

TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS

LA RAFLE

Last year, La Rafle became a box-office hit in France, and its audiences included thousands of young people who came to find out for the first time about a dark chapter in their country's history. On July 16–17, 1942, over 13,000 Jews—among them, 4,000 children—were rounded up in Paris by French police, on the orders of the Vichy government, and were held at Paris' Velodrome d'Hiver sports stadium. This meticulously constructed script, based on in-depth research and actual stories, follows the story of Joseph Weismann, a 10-year-old boy, and his family as they struggle to remain united through the days in the Velodrome and during their time in a transit camp. Boasting a wonderful cast that includes Jean Reno (Leon: The Professional) and Melanie Laurent (Inglorious Basterds), filmmaker Roselyn Bosch offers one of the most effective dramas of recent years to deal with the human cost of Vichy's collaboration with the Nazis.

'Not a platform for hatred'

In fact, the panel's 21-page executive summary only mentions QuAIA by name once.

Instead, after nine months of debating and community consultations, the panel urged that all Parade participants "be required to sign an enforceable undertaking not to portray messages or images that condone or promote violence, hatred or negative stereotypes against any group."

The panel also recommended that Pride set up a "dispute resolution process" that would be binding for all participants.

Francisco Alvarez, co-chair of Pride Toronto, said his organization is in the process of implementing this recommendation by assembling a pool of "qualified dispute resolution officers."

"We are quite certain that when we are set up to do this... [complaints about QuAIA] will go through the dispute resolution process, and the final outcome will be determined by an independent arbitrator, not by Pride Toronto. Pride will abide by this decision, whatever it may be," Alvarez wrote in an e-mail.

Regarding Ford's threat to withhold funding if QuAIA participates this year, Alvarez said Pride will fight that decision if it happens.

"If the city later decides to cut funding to one of its major annual community and tourist events, one that generates millions in tax revenues and hotel, restaurant and retail profits for Toronto businesses, we will be prepared to contest that decision, and, if necessary, reduce the scope of the festival. But we are hopeful that we will continue to receive the city's support."

Justine Apple, Kulanu Toronto's executive director, said she supports Ford's funding stance and anticipates that QuAIA will again be allowed to march in the parade.

She confirmed that Kulanu would also take part again this year and that her organization would seek community-wide Jewish support, as it did in 2010. She said Kulanu plans to meet with Congress and UJA Federation next month.

"Pride is about the celebration of gay rights. It's not a platform from which to spew hatred and intolerance. QuAIA's messaging is clearly discriminatory, divisive and inflammatory and has no place in the parade," Apple said.

She added that Kulanu is pleased that Pride is forming the dispute resolution committee.

"Pride is trying to be more transparent by listing groups that apply for the parade by putting their names on their website. At that point, other groups can look at that and see if they don't like who's scheduled to march" and file a complaint, she said.

Apple said that Kulanu will be "out and proud" at this year's parade and remains "excited" to be part of it.

Fed. govt. gives shul accessibility grant

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Diane Finley, Canada's minister of human resources and skills development, announced last Friday that Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and 296 other community projects across the country will receive grants in the coming year to improve accessibility for people with disabilities.

The Toronto shul will receive $75,000 in matching funds to install an elevator that will service three levels of the building.

The grant is from the federal government's Enabling Accessibility fund, which is providing a total of $14.2 million for projects to improve accessibility through renovation, construction and retrofitting of buildings; modification of vehicles; and enhancement to technologies. It represents the maximum grant available from the fund.

Beth Emeth's lower level, which is currently accessible only by stairs, houses Gan Yeladim Day Care and Kadimah Educational Centre, which serves adults with special needs.

Gan Yeladim supervisor Shelley Wise said she was thrilled by the grant. With the elevator, the daycare will become accessible for children in wheelchairs, as well as to parents or visitors with physical challenges. She recalled that a staff member once had to take time off work because her foot was in a cast and, more recently, a parent hurt her leg. "[An elevator] services everybody," Wise said.

Kadimah supervisor Marcel Cohen, who applied for the grant with Wise, said that several Kadimah students use walkers. "It's very perilous for them to come down the stairs." He added that an elevator would allow for new students to join Kadimah as well.

Beth Emeth's Rabbi Howard Morrison told reporters, "Forty years ago it wasn't on our moral compass to think about the ideals we are thinking about now."

Last summer the shul's chapel was renovated and is now fully accessible, he said. As well, he added, two years ago, a bimah ramp was installed in the main sanctuary.

Finley told reporters, "Our government values the abilities of all Canadians and celebrates our progress as a society towards the full inclusion of people with disabilities."

The grant projects also create jobs, empower people with disabilities, and increase their financial stability, she added.

Reena receives Ontario Trillium Foundation grant

Compiled by CJN Staff

A recently announced grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation will help the Reena organization move a step closer to making its Reena Community Residence now under construction at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Campus in Vaughan, Ont., a reality.

Some of the $150,000 two-year grant will be used to hire staff to oversee the formulation of intake and direct service protocols to develop an interdisciplinary, integrated model of service delivery for people with physical, cognitive and developmental disabilities and the frail elderly, and to develop a more inclusive community.

Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman recently visited Reena's Henry and Toby Battle Centre to announce the grant. "Reena is one of those organizations that truly understands the meaning of community, friendship and dignity," Shurman said. "Through its programs, hundreds of families... have benefited."

Planning for the $23-million four-storey housing complex began in 2005, with several community agencies, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Kehilla Residential Program, Jewish Family and Child, and Circle of Care. The vision was for supportive housing on the new Lebovic Campus, where residents with special needs would live together, but also be supported by a seamless delivery of service and be integrated with the other programs on the campus.

The residence is adjacent to the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, which offers recreational, cultural and educational programs, as well as a wellness centre and Mount Sinai's ambulatory health-care facility.

Reena was established almost 40 years ago by parents of children with developmental disabilities on the principle that those with a disability have the right to live with dignity within their community. For more information on Reena, visit www.reena.org/. For more information on the Lebovic Campus, visit www.tomorrowcampaign.com.

Canadian Egyptian Jews discuss unrest in Egypt

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

While Egyptians continue to take to the streets to demand a new democratic government, Egyptian Jewish expatriates living in Toronto are following the unfolding events carefully.

Dan Yarhi, who immigrated from Cairo in 1957 when he was six years old, said he has been following the developments in Egypt over the past six weeks. Based on his own experiences, he can understand why the Egyptians have lashed out against the military government.

"As a kid, I heard them in the streets chanting "Kill all the Jews" and then we were forced to leave... We were ousted, we were given two suitcases and five Egyptian pounds and everything else was taken by the army," Yarhi said.

"I don't trust the army now, and the Egyptians of today are displaying that they don't trust the army."

Since the protests began in late January, Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak was ousted from his post and former air force general Ahmed Shafiq, the man Mubarak appointed as prime minister before he left office, was also pushed by the Egyptian public to resign.

"Arabs seem to have to have an enemy. Right now, it's the army," Yarhi said.

"But [the protesters] have no structure. They are still going to end up with the same unemployment, the same problems with food, the same problems with corruption.

"Whether [Egypt is ruled] by this guy or that guy, it doesn't matter. It will just be a matter of time before the hand goes under the table and you have to give money. That is just the culture."

Egyptians massed in large numbers in Tahrir Square in Cairo. [Israel Sun photos]

Emil Cohen, who immigrated from Egypt to Israel in 1960 when he was 11 years old, before moving to Toronto as an adult, agreed that the fact that the protesters are not organized is a problem.

The protests in Egypt remind him of the Iranian Revolution in 1979 – also known as the Islamic Revolution – which was brought on by massive protests against the oppressive, corrupt leaders.

'Democracy starts with education'

As a result, Ayatollah Ruholla Khomeini, an Islamic fundamentalist, rose to power.

"It starts with the educated and then it gets hijacked," Cohen said.

He added that just a week after Mubarak stepped down, the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist movement that was banned under Mubarak's rule, organized a march for hundreds of thousands of people.

The Muslim Brotherhood, an international organization that promotes implementing sharia law, is currently Egypt's most organized group.

"Already, they are hijacking it... If the situation in Egypt mixes with religion, the outcome will not be good,"Cohen said.

He said the question is whether the Egyptian population sees themselves as Muslims first and Egyptians second, or Egyptians first and Muslims second.

Yarhi said that he anticipates that Egyptians will be given the right to a democratic election, but a democracy in Egypt may look very different from those in the western world.

"They don't know what democracy is. You can make a scarecrow and stuff it full of straw and say, look this is a human being... but it's not. It is just a sum total of its stuffing... What they're going to stuff this with is not necessarily what democracy is," Yarhi said.

"You just hope for the best, but you're guarded. I know it's not going to be what everyone in America thinks it's going to be," he said, adding that corruption is very much ingrained in Egyptian society.

Cohen wondered if democracy is the right thing for a population that has a high illiteracy rate, some estimating it at more than 30 per cent.

Women, young and old, showed their disdain for Hosni Mubarak and his regime.

"Democracy starts with education," Cohen said.

Yarhi said that while Cairo is a developed city with a population of nearly eight million, just a short distance out of the city, "it's the middle ages.

"As soon as you get onto the farms and into the deserts, it is the way it was since time immemorial and nothing changes there. These people don't have electricity, let alone the Internet, let alone can read a newspaper, but the newspapers are all controlled, so even if they did read them, they'd have no inkling," Yarhi said.

The situation in Egypt is one that will take generations to correct, he added.

"The young people who have an education other than the Qur'an... if they [stop] listening to the mullah, maybe [something will change]."

Meanwhile, Yarhi said he's worried about what the political unrest in the Middle East could mean for Israel.

"Ultimately, in a matter of six months, a year, two years... people will start pointing fingers, and they'll start pointing fingers at Israel. Because they are the problem, because they are doing well," he said.

Cohen, on the other hand, said he's not worried about Israel "one bit.

"They can't do anything to Israel. They can sing and dance, and they can even send some rockets here... But we are bound by answering in kind. No more than that."

While Cohen doesn't predict that this could lead to war with Israel, he said, "Egypt will have to fight an internal war to decide who they want to be. That is the key. It is finally time for them to say who they are for real... where they are headed."

Tzedakah helps giver as much as receiver

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg

At one time or another, we've all contributed to a financial campaign. Projects, buildings and institutions call upon us to join with them in their endeavours. Imagine, if you will, a scenario in which each of your campaign contributors have been called upon and pledges have been made, but there's still a shortfall. The last name on your list is a well-known philanthropist, and when asked for a pledge, he says: "Let me know how much your campaign is short, and I'll make up the difference." What would your reaction be? You would probably thank and applaud him for this most magnaminous offer.

A similar scene can be found in the Torah portion of Vayakhel, although with quite a different ending. At the outset of the construction of the Mishkan, the Tabernacle, the nesiim, the heads of each tribe, waited until the completion of construction before volunteering their wealth. Even though this may seem commendable, the Torah, in rebuke of this attitude, removed the letter "yud' from the word nesiim, which is normally spelled with two yudin.

The obvious question is why? Most probably, what the leadership donated was worth more than the total of all the other donations. In a related story in the Talmud (Kiddushin 31a), we see that the sages were willing to pay great sums for the precious stones that adorned the priestly garments. Why then were the nesiim punished?

Perhaps by looking at the rebuke, we can understand the reasoning. When the letter "yud" is added to a Hebrew word, it creates a plural. The nesiim did not share with the multitude of the Nation of Israel in the building of the Mishkan. They hesitated in their fulfilment of this mitzvah and thereby missed it completely.

Last week, we celebrated a Shabbat known as Shabbat Shekalim. It received this name because the special Torah portion concerning the commandment of the giving of the half shekel is read publicly. This obligation was incumbent equally on both the affluent and the underprivileged during the month of Adar. The prosperous could not give more and the unfortunate no less. The commentaries explain that this mandatory donation was collected for the benefit of the entire nation, since it was used for the purchase of the daily sacrifices of atonement. The shekel was the great equalizer – it had to be given by everyone, on time and for the benefit of the nation.

Rabbinic Reflections

The nesiim should have anticipated the possibility that, in their enthusiasm and devotion to Hashem, the people might contribute everything themselves – which, in fact, is what happened in the case of the Mishkan.

Covering a deficit is a wonderful offer if one is concerned about the recipient. But in the case of the Mishkan, the recipient was the Creator of the universe. He did not need the assistance of the nesiim or anyone else. The commandment to donate to the Mishkan was a singular privilege granted to the Jewish people for their own benefit.

Tzedakah is a great mitzvah, but like all other commandments, it's based on godly principles and ethics. Perhaps the underlying message is that when it comes to mitzvot that embody kindness and empathy, such as tzedakah, we may be receiving more than we're giving.

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg is executive director of Mizrachi Canada and rabbi of Congregation Ayin L'Tzion in Thornhill, Ont.

Prison insights

In an almost unbelievable application of the verse, "Love your neighbour as yourself," our sages teach that one must give a convicted killer a "pleasant death." Even those who commit capital crimes must be dealt with humanely.

Thus, Judaism has no concept of death row, and in the rare circumstances when a death penalty was to be administered, it had to be done on the morrow of conviction.

Such an attitude may help explain why – strange as it sounds to us moderns – the Jewish penal code apparently does not have a jail system. Monetary restitution was required for violations of civil law, exile to another city for criminal negligence (with a relative allowed to kill one who leaves his new abode). Those considered a threat to society – and the Talmud makes little mention of such occurrences – were dealt with on an ad hoc basis.

With little left but a lifetime in jail, Bernie Madoff has expressed his view that the banks were well aware of his Ponzi scheme but chose to turn a blind eye as the profits rolled in. He has also claimed that he too is a victim, but of his own making. He is like many sinners – it is only after the fact that they reflect on what they have done. And that's often too late.

As for the role of the banks, while the "testimony" of the convict is not admissible, I have no reason to doubt that Madoff's words are, in fact, true. It is the rare person and even rarer business that concerns itself with the possible moral wrongdoings of others – often they are little concerned with their own wrongdoings. Biblical notions of rebuke, or the prohibition to partner in a business transaction in which, while my actions may be legal and moral, others involved are less so, play little role in the modern marketplace.

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Minding our own business is a mantra that allows us to deal with others without a second thought. One does not steal $50 billion on one's own, and the signs of the fraud and opportunities to expose it before it caused so much damage were ignored. As both the Jewish and secular legal systems mete no punishment for those who could prevent harm but choose not to do so, we can only rely on moral suasion.

In the realm of morality, it is quality not quantity that matters most. Jewish law recognizes no distinction between petty and grand larceny. If we understand that stealing is an affront to God, then numbers don't really matter.

From this perspective Bernie Madoff is little worse than your white collar criminal who may "only" steal a million dollars or so. Both those who steal a penny and those who take a billion dollars lose their ability to be trusted in any and all matters of Jewish law, whether civil, criminal or religious. While their words carry no legal weight even a moral leper can at times have moral insight into the actions of others. We would be wise to listen.

Israel identification among young Jews debated

Has support for the State of Israel been eroding among non-Orthodox American Jews? A few years ago, respected scholars Steven Cohen of Hebrew Union College and Ari Kelman of the University of California published a study that argued that it has. An equally respected team – Theodore Sasson, Charles Kadushin and Leonard Saxe, all affiliated with Brandeis University – challenged that hypothesis, arguing that there is no evidence of erosion of support for Israel among American Jews.

In late 2010, the journal Contemporary Jewry took the unusual step of publishing an entire volume of 24 academic articles, all dedicated to this debate. Understanding that the question was hardly "academic" and is indeed of interest to many Jews, the journal even made the volume available free on the Internet (www.contemporaryjewry.org/24.html).

Views & Reviews

Martin Lockshin

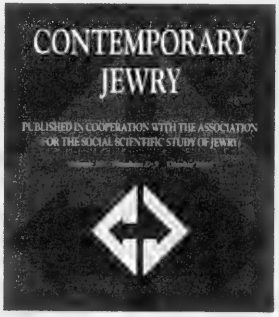
The volume is fascinating reading, especially if you (like me) have an interest in the question of what can and cannot be legitimately learned from survey data. Both competing teams and most of the other scholars who joined the fray in this volume were, for the most part, looking at the same survey data but interpreting it differently. One side saw convincing evidence that American Jews today feel less connection to Israel than in the past. The other side concluded that younger American Jews do not identify with Israel as much as older Jews do, and that this pattern has existed for decades: Jews identify with Israel more as they mature. For this second group, this pattern sufficiently explains the low levels of support for Israel found among young American Jews in recent surveys. The scholars in the journal do not reach a consensus, although, simply counting the opinions, it seems that a few more scholars lean toward the so-called "distancing hypothesis" than toward the "identity comes with aging" hypothesis.

An interesting side issue was the debate about whether survey data is the best way of deciding an issue like this or whether softer data (like interviews) has a place in determining what is really happening. As a non-sociologist, I had always assumed that survey data would surely trump more impressionistic arguments, but apparently sociologists do not take this for granted.

Morton Weinfeld of McGill University mentions that if distancing is present in the United States, it is certainly less of a factor here in Canada. Nevertheless I know that there is clearly some alarm even in the Canadian Jewish community about the question of the next generation's identification with Israel.

My former colleague at York University, Alex Pomson, who is now at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, has some sharp insights into recent developments related to this issue in North American Jewish schools. Pomson writes in this journal that Jewish schools are now being told to "teach" identification with Israel to their students. But the ideal way of cultivating such support, he says, is through experiential and informal education. Schoolteachers, generally trained to provide formal education, may not be as successful at this task.

Pomson compares recent developments in "Israel education" in North America to what happened in "bar/bat mitzvah education" in previous decades. He cites a study by York University's Stuart Schoenfeld that argues bar/bat mitzvah education used to be left to the family and the community, as part of the education for life for a young person who would become an observant member of the community. But bar/bat mitzvah education is now generally the task of the Jewish school, and is often geared to one-time performance in synagogue, never to be repeated. So also, says Pomson, education for supporting Israel, which generally used to come from the family and the community, is now assigned by parents and community leaders to the schools. Teachers are somehow expected to prepare young people, who do not really know what a university campus is, for a one-time performance: being Israel advocates during the three or four years when they will come face to face with forces on campus that are inimical to the Jewish state.



My favourite analysis of the distancing hypothesis in the journal was that of Chaim Waxman, formerly of Rutgers University, now retired in Jerusalem. Waxman points out that isolating identification with Israel from other factors of Jewish identity does not make sense. The 1990s witnessed a shocking 20 per cent reduction in membership in major Jewish organizations in the United States. This is not just disaffection with formal religion; Jews today are less likely to be members of secular Jewish organizations, too. They are less likely to marry other Jews. They are less likely to support such statements as "Jews in the United States and Jews around the world share a common destiny" or "I have a special responsibility to take care of Jews in need around the world." Waxman writes: "Younger Jews are generally less involved in Jewish life, and less committed to Jewish philanthropy."

What we are witnessing in the United States and to a lesser degree in Canada, then, is a general reduction in all types of Jewish identification. Is it any surprise that Israel identification and support are also eroding?

A more difficult question is: could young Jews' disillusionment with Israel be the cause of their distancing from other aspects of Jewish identity? While we all might know a young person who says that his/her disaffection with Judaism results from mixed feelings (or worse) about Israel, actually some evidence supports the opposite conclusion. Studies of Taglit -Birthright, the Israel trip for young people program, show that this ostensibly Israel-oriented informal education venture mostly impacts (positively!) on other aspects of the participants' Jewish identity. For example, Birthright participants have a lower intermarriage rate, even if their rate of aliyah is not significantly higher than that of the population at large.

In other words, it is not the case that we have a large number of Jews who relate positively to their Judaism but have little or no identification with Israel. Rather we have large numbers of Jews who are disaffected with or indifferent to their Judaism. Educational ventures to save our young Jews from anti-Israel forces may be of some value. But perhaps they deflect us from the more crucial task of educating for all aspects of Jewish identification.

Students stand up to Israeli Apartheid Week

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Jewish and pro-Israel students are busy doing their part to counter the messages being put forth by Israeli Apartheid Week organizers.

IAW, an annual series of anti-Israel events that began in 2005 at the University of Toronto and has since spread to more than 40 cities around the world, is currently underway and will run until March 14.

But pro-Israel students at universities across the country are determined to provide their campus communities with information, speakers and cultural events that will help people see Israel beyond the conflict.

Emily Berg, Hillel's Israel affairs program co-ordinator at York University, said Hillel is pushing forward with a three-pronged approach made up of "tabling," lectures and cultural events.

"The tabling is more about hard-core advocacy, and it is going to address the political situation and the allegations and accusations made against Israel," Berg said.

A campaign titled "What's your peace plan?" – which will run alongside IAW until March 11 – offers information about Israel's obstacles to peace, while presenting Jewish and pro-Israel student as being pro-peace.

"We want to take the conversation away from the negativity and bring it more back to peace and have more productive conversations and open the dialogue in a civil way," Berg said.

Hillel also booked speakers to lecture at York, Ryerson University and the University of Toronto about Israel's achievements and its success as a thriving democracy.

On March 3, York hosted an event called "Pluralism, Diversity and Minority Rights in Israel" in which five Israeli students who were either Ethiopian, Arab Christian, Muslim or Druze spoke on a panel about living as a minority in the Jewish state. The same event was held the following day at Ryerson.

Ishmael Khaldi

A number of York student groups, including Hasbara at York, Jewish Students' Law Association and Hillel, collaborated to host Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney, author and senator Linda Frum, and Young Zionist Partnership founder Paul Cooper on March 10, as part of Democracy Week.

Beca Bookman, Hillel's Israel affairs chair at U of T, said that in addition to presenting students with "welcoming, open and honest conversation about politics, security and peace" through tabling sessions in Sidney Smith Hall – U of T's busiest building on campus – Hillel is also hosting Karen Held on March 9.

Held is a doctor who volunteered in Haiti with IsraAID, an Israeli humanitarian aid organization, following the devastating earthquake last year.

On March 10, Michael Coren, the host of the nightly Michael Coren Show on CTS Television, will lecture at Ryerson and will interview Ishmael Khaldi, a Bedouin and an Israeli diplomat, who speaks out against the concept of Israeli apartheid. The following evening, Khaldi also speaks at Beth Tikvah Congregation.

Gregory Levey

Gregory Levey, a journalist, Ryerson professor and author of How to Make Peace in the Middle East in Six Months or Less Without Leaving Your Apartment, will be at York on March 14 to give a light-hearted talk about his book and his experience as a former speech writer for the Israeli government.

As for the cultural aspect of Hillel's three-pronged approach to shedding a positive light on Israel, Layla Lavan, an Israeli version of the local all-night event Nuit Blanche, will showcase Israeli music, fine arts and fashion.

Layla Lavan, which will be held at On the Rox Club on March 13, is an Israeli fair that will feature Israeli cuisine, crafts and photography, a fashion show that will present Shenkin West and Marge Designs, and musical performances by Israeli acts including Eatliz and Automatic Toys.

For more about the Hillel events, check out Hillel of Greater Toronto on Facebook.

David Plotkin, a 21-year-old McGill University sociology student, and Hasbara's campus co-ordinator for Montreal and Ottawa, said that pro-Israel students have been working hard to defend themselves against some of the claims being made by IAW organizers.

Campaign within a human rights framework

"The three messages that we promote are that Israel wants peace, Israel doesn't have a partner for peace at this time, and especially in Canada, we really push the shared values of Canadians and Israelis," Plotkin said.

At Carleton University, Hasbara partnered with the Israel Awareness Committee to offer students an Israel advocacy training session last Sunday.

Plotkin also established a new student group called the McGill Friends of Israel and, with the help of Hasbara, organized a tabling campaign called "Support Human Rights? Support Israel."

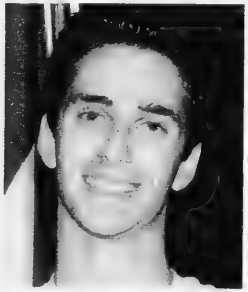
Plotkin hopes the campaign, which will run the week of March 14, will "enlighten students about Israel's freedom of expression, the judicial process, freedom of the press and religious freedom.

"We know the narrative on campus is really strongly about human rights these days, so we're trying to work within that framework and show that Israel is a model of human rights in a region that doesn't necessarily have that."

In addition to the tabling sessions, a screening of The Case for Israel, a film based on the book by Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz, will be presented at McGill on March 10 by political science professor Harold Waller.

To learn more about Hasbara, visit www.hasbarafellowships.org.

Paige MacPherson, a fourth-year political science student at Dalhousie University who is the vice-president external of Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS), said her organization is also offering students ideas and support to respond to anti-Israel sentiments on campus.



David Plotkin

CFJS' Size Doesn't Matter campaign (see more about this campaign on the Heebonics page) "highlights Israel beyond the conflict and shows the beautiful exciting place that we all know Israel is," MacPherson said.

Another CFJS initiative is the Truth Campaign, which "challenges the inversion of history that we've seen coming from the other side and it provides short, thoughtful responses to the IAW rhetoric and propaganda that they're providing," MacPherson said, adding that videos, poster and information can be found at canadianfederationofjewishstudents.com.

Ashley Faintuch, a 22-year-old University of Winnipeg marketing student and the Stand With Us Emerson Fellow in Winnipeg, is leading Israel Peace Week there during the week of March 14. The peace week is an international initiative of Hasbara.

Faintuch, who is one of 40 student leaders trained by Stand With Us to run Israel education events and combat anti-Israel rhetoric onspecially campus, hopes Israel Peace Week will spread awareness about human rights and democracy in Israel.

"[The campaign] will compare the Israeli democracy to the democracy, or lack thereof, in neighbouring countries as well as apartheid South Africa," she said.

"Integrated in the campaign will also be the message that Israel has no partner for peace, and we will talk about Hamas and Iran... and the human rights and democratic abuse they perpetrate among their own people."

Students who are interested in learning more about pro-Israel strategies and programs can visit the

> 'Especially in Canada, we really push the shared values of Canadians and Israelis'

Stand With Us website at www.standwithus.com. They can also download slogans for signs, and flyers for tabling events.

Off campus in Toronto, city councillor James Pasternak released a statement last week that condemned IAW as an "offensive and repugnant event" and said the organizers are "advancing a preposterous analogy of the Israel-Palestinian question, the history of the apartheid regime in South Africa" and "undermining the peace process."

MacPherson said that despite IAW's presence on campuses across the country, the campaign has been a failure.

"All it has achieved, essentially is the creation of a toxic, intimidating environment for students on Canadian campuses. It's not intellectual, it's not academic, there is no room for discourse. Essentially, it's just propaganda. Nowhere in their campaign do they mention the word peace."

Photography students see Israel through a different lens

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When a group of recently graduated Humber College photography students travelled to Israel and Jordan last year to hone their photography skills, they were also exposed to the culture, history and politics of a region they knew little about.

The 23 creative photography graduates who took part in the 15-day tour last May are currently exhibiting their work at the Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery in Toronto until March 23, in a show titled Through the Eyes: Israel and Jordan.

Brenden Wilson, a 20-year-old freelance photographer who went to Israel with the group last year said he was blown away by Israel's beautiful landscapes.

He said that before the trip, he "definitely assumed Israel would be more desert-like... But the beauty of the country really got to me and it made me realize that there is much more to this country than what the pundits have to say."

Humber photography professor Neil Fox, who initiated the annual field trips six years ago, said that while the tours offer students amazing landscapes to photograph, part of his objective is to expose them to cultures that are completely foreign to them.

"Each of the countries we visit, I want them to experience it," said Fox, who has lead past trips to Morocco, Vietnam and Ecuador.

This is the second time he has lead a group to Israel.

Young said that this photo, of the Tomb of Jesus Christ in Jerusalem, was taken from a tricky angle to avoid the tourists surrounding the monument.
[Kelvin Young photos]

"It's a particular favourite of mine. I lived in Jerusalem for three years," he said. "I think it's a great country to go explore, to photograph and to learn about."

Fox said that when it comes to Israel's culture and politics, most of the students went into the trip with very little understanding of the country, but that changed once they experienced it.

"It's very common that when people first go to Israel they are afraid that they're not going to be safe, but when they get there, they are amazed by how safe they actually feel.

"It occurs to them that this isn't the way they've heard it on the news and we get into a dialogue about why that is and what the current political situation is... They come away realizing that it is a very complex issue and that it is not the way they had thought about it before."

A tour of Israel 'from tip to tip'

Kelvin Young, another Humber grad who went to Israel with the group, agreed that the trip "opened up our eyes by bringing us to very unique places.

"I personally was not very aware [of Israel], and many others were not very aware," said Young, who contributed seven photographs to the exhibit.

He said they toured Israel "from tip to tip," visiting Tel Aviv, Netanya, Northern Galilee, Jerusalem, Eilat, the Dead Sea and Masada, as well as Wadi Rum and Petra in Jordan.

Wilson said that while he did have superficial knowledge of Middle East politics, he was surprised by the similarities between Canada and Israel.

"Everyone has their opinions on Israel and the Palestinians, and I guess what you don't really hear about and see in the media is that everyone just sort of lives their lives regardless," Wilson said.

"What got me is how similar it was to where I live."

Fox said the exhibit, which held its opening reception late last month and featured an address by Oded Grofman, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada, will be of interest to anyone who knows and loves Israel.

"For anyone who knows the country well, I think they'll enjoy very much looking at all the different perspectives of the land," Fox said. "There is a huge variety of images, styles and forms. The students were encouraged to pursue whatever images they chose and they chose what they felt was significant to them."

He added that he hopes the exhibit will not only be a point of interest to the Jewish community, but also help the students build a bridge to a community that they may not have associated with before.

For more information about the exhibit, call the Joseph D. Carrier Art Gallery at 416-789-7011 ext. 300.

Winchevsky meeting with CJC, federation in limbo

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) have replied to a request for a meeting by the Winchevsky Centre, following a decision by Congress and the federation to disassociate themselves from the secular Zionist organization. However, it's still not clear whether a meeting will take place.

The organizations' decision resulted from a Feb. 1 event at the centre that featured an anti-Zionist speaker.

In a Feb. 3 e-mail, Sheldon Goodman and David Spiro, co-chairs of the federation's committee on public affairs, and Frank Bialystok, chair of CJC, Ontario region, informed Maxine Hermolin, the centre's executive director, that they were severing ties.

They concluded, "If you would like to discuss this, please contact Howard English [of UJA Federation] or Len Rudner [of CJC]."

Hermolin and board members of Toronto United Jewish People's Order (UJPO) – which is housed in the centre and co-sponsored the event – interpreted the e-mail as an invitation, David Abramowitz, president of UJPO Canada, told The CJN.

Thus, three days later, on Feb. 6, Hermolin e-mailed back to request a meeting. "Please contact us at your earliest convenience to arrange this," she wrote.

However, it wasn't until Feb. 28 that she received a reply. English told The CJN at the time that the delay was due to "a lot of discussion" about the issue.

David Spiro

The brief e-mail acknowledged receipt of Hermolin's letter, concluding in its second and final paragraph, "The positions of the Winchevsky Centre, UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress regarding the event Never Again for Anyone have already been well articulated in correspondence between our organizations and the event has already taken place. Therefore, could you please indicate the proposed subject matter for this meeting beyond a review of those positions?"

Abramowitz said the board of Toronto UJPO is contemplating an appropriate response. Because they thought that Hermolin was responding to an invitation to discuss the issue, and because there hasn't been any negative fallout, the response was still under discussion at press time.

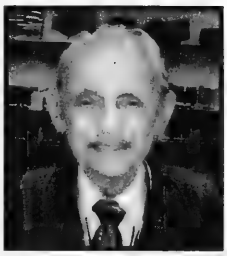
Harry Walsh was Canada's oldest practising lawyer

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Harry Walsh, Canada's oldest practising lawyer as well as one of the greatest criminal lawyers this country has ever produced, died Feb. 23 at age 97 as a result of complications from a fall in his home.

His passing came less than two months after he was awarded the Order of Canada for his contributions, largely in the legal sphere, to Canadian society. He was a leader both in eliminating the death penalty in Canada and in introducing a legal aid system across the country, achievements in which he took great pride.

OBITUARY



Harry Walsh

At his funeral on Sunday, Feb. 27, Walsh was remembered as a mentor, a humanist, a man whose memory was undimmed by time and as a loving father and zaide.

In a letter he sent from his home in Toronto, Rabbi Peretz Weizman remembered Walsh as a "gifted individual" who combined a "brilliant mind" with a "golden heart."

"He was a pillar of the Bnay Abraham Synagogue," Rabbi Weizman's former synagogue in Winnipeg, the rabbi said.

Walsh was born in West Kildonan, the first-born son of immigrants Philip and Faigel Walsh, who operated a dairy farm. Walsh was one of seven siblings, all of whom predeceased him.

Philip Walsh died in 1928, leaving 15-year-old Harry as the "man in the family," charged with helping to support his family. His grandson, Zachary, related how Walsh sold newspapers and worked in a candy factory to pay his way through law school.

As a criminal lawyer, Walsh handled thousands of cases over his career. Colleague Greg Brodsky noted that he never turned a case down because a client couldn't pay.

For most of his career, Walsh practised with the late Archie Micay. Since 1999, he had the pleasure of being able to practice with his son, Paul, and he came into the office every day up until his accident.

In addition to his contributions to the law, Walsh was also a strong supporter of the Jewish community in Winnipeg and Israel. He took great pride in being one of the founders of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba.

"We received a note from Harry in mid-January," says Marsha Cowan, the foundation's CEO. "In it, he expressed his admiration and support for all our activities. He was a wonderful man and a great role model."

While he supported a wide range of Israel-based organizations, his major passion in Israel was the Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. He and his late (second) wife, Irene, were among the founders of the local chapter of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and served as the chapter's first presidents.

(Walsh's first wife, Ruth, died at a young age.)

"Harry and Irene visited Israel 33 times," says Carla Vickar, executive director of the Winnipeg chapter of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. "They co-founded the Harry Walsh QC Career Development Chair in Jewish Law and Morality. Harry was active right up until a couple of months ago. He will be truly missed by our Ben-Gurion family."

At his funeral, Walsh's daughter, Arlyne, who lives in Toronto, recalled a father who loved to sing.

"He always said that what matters in life is how you will be remembered, by whom and for what," she said. "He was my hero."

Optometrist was active in Sydney, N.S., community

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

Garson Lecker, a community-minded, active member of the Sydney, N.S., Jewish community, passed away March 3, a few weeks shy of his 90th birthday.

A well-respected optometrist, Lecker had served as president and vice-president of Temple Sons of Israel in the Cape Breton city, and in later years, he served as gabbai while rarely missing a Friday evening or Saturday service. He was also a member of the congregation's choir for 55 years and was the Cape Breton representative on the Atlantic Jewish Council.

Temple Sons of Israel president Martin Chernin praised Lecker's commitment to optometry, but added about his Jewish community connections, "He was a gentleman and was always there to help if anyone needed help."

Lecker was born in Winnipeg but came to Sydney when he was stationed there during World War II. It was there he met Edith, his wife of 65 years.

As an optometrist, he brought travelling clinics to rural areas of Cape Breton from the 1940s through the 1980s. Lecker was also president of the Canadian Association of Optometrists from 1975 to 1977 and spent 12 years on its national council. As well, he served as president of the Nova Scotia Association of Optometrists.

Garson's daughter, Sheri Lecker, of Halifax, said it was an honour for her father to be able "to open the shul doors, turn on the lights and the heat for the congregants."

Even though he was born in Winnipeg, Sheri said her father grew to know and love Cape Breton and had a passion for the people, both in the Jewish and the wider communities. He was a member of, among others, the Rotary and Kinsmen clubs, as well as the Masons.

She said he was active and healthy until about 15 months ago, when he developed heart problems, ironically starting on the bimah at shul.

Irwin Mendleson, a native of Sydney who now practises optometry in Halifax, called Lecker, "well-mannered, precise and respectable. He was a fine gentleman."

There's no moment to seize if other side isn't keen

Since Israel isn't directly involved in the internal Arab revolts that are creating upheaval in the Middle East, it hasn't been the focus of recent media attention. To be sure, there have been several reports about how Israel might be affected by events whose outcomes remain unclear. Principal among these is the fate of the Israel-Egypt peace treaty.

Still, Israel has mainly been of peripheral interest – at least until now. There are indications that this might be changing.

Increasingly, we're seeing stories and commentaries that take the following line: given the bold, progressive move toward freedom in the Arab world, it's also time for Israel to also seize the initiative and make peace with the Palestinians.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What's striking is that this argument is not being pushed by Israel's inveterate critics, who are never at a loss to bring Israel into the picture. Instead, it's being pursued by some who are supportive.

For instance, the National Post (March 1) reprinted Richard Cohen's Washington Post column from the previous day. Cohen devoted the first part to discussing the extreme antisemitism that has featured prominently in Arab nationalism. He mentioned former grand mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin al-Husseini, the Palestinian leader of the "Arab Revolt" against Zionism in the 1930s and '40s who spent World War II in Berlin as Hitler's guest. Cohen also discussed the Muslim Brotherhood and its spiritual leader, Sheikh Yusurf al-Qaradawi, who recently addressed more than one million Egyptians in Cairo, where he called for the "liberation" of the al-Aqsa mosque in Jerusalem.

"The Arab world is saturated in Jew-hatred," Cohen wrote. "Nowhere in the Middle East is peace with Israel popular. Nowhere in the Middle East is antisemitism considered aberrant or weird," he continued, adding that Arab nationalism mixed with antisemitism (which might be unleashed even more than before in Egypt and other Arab countries undergoing populist revolts) is "a combustible and unstable compound."

However, in what can only be described as a breathtaking non-sequitur, in the very next paragraph, Cohen argued: "Consequently, now would be the propitious time for Israel to settle with the Palestinians." As though it were entirely up to Israel! And as if Israel hadn't tried on previous occasions (Camp David, Annapolis) to strike a two-state deal with the Palestinians – something both former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and current PA leader Mahmoud Abbas have rejected (notwithstanding the recent Al-Jazeera/Guardian spin on the "Palestine Papers" to make Israel look like the rejectionist party).

Cohen acknowledged that nothing Israel could offer the Palestinians would satisfy extreme Arab nationalists or the Islamists of Hamas and Hezbollah. Yet he didn't even pause to ask whether the bitterly divided Palestinians are prepared to compromise with Israel. (Following the leak of the "Palestine Papers," which included accounts of proposals being considered during the Annapolis talks in 2007-8, embarrassed Fatah officials denied before their outraged public that they were prepared to settle on final status issues.)

Nor did Cohen bother to ask whether a more weakened Fatah leadership would be willing or could stand up to extremist elements among Palestinians and the broader Arab community, whose animosity towards Jews and Jewish sovereignty is intensifying. After all, Abbas refuses to engage directly with Israel and instead is trying to use the international community (including the United Nations) to impose a solution on Israel – in which case, Abbas need not compromise.

Yet Cohen concluded: "Still, the creation of a Palestinian state...will take some air out of this particular balloon and, possibly, improve Israel's deteriorating moral standing in Europe and elsewhere."

If only.

To be sure, Israel needs to do all it can within its means to advance peace. A number of Israeli journalists have made this very point. Even Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has recently said that Israel cannot ignore international opinion.

But at the same time, one cannot ignore the historic and diplomatic record – as too often happens when journalists fail to do their homework – and pretend that peace is at hand as long as Israel makes all the expected gestures.

Tories not apologizing for ethnic ad campaign plan

Jews being 'stereotyped,' Liberal MP

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The Conservative government will not apologize for targeting ethnic communities as part of any election strategy it uses.

Last Friday, the government mistakenly sent a letter to the NDP outlining its electoral advertising plans to court the immigrant vote in the country in various "very ethnic" ridings, including the South Asian, Chinese and Ukrainian populations, and Jewish voters in the ridings of Mount Royal in Montreal and Eglinton-Lawrence in Toronto.

Accompanying the letter was a PowerPoint document titled "Breaking Through: Building the Conservative Brand," which outlines the Conservatives' ethnic media ad strategy. It lists both Mount Royal and Eglinton-Lawrence as part of the government's "Top 10 ridings with an ethnic group comprising 20 per cent or more of the population."

The strategy also tells Conservative party members: "There are lots of ethnic voters. There will be quite a few more soon. They live where we need to win.

Jason Kenney

Need to positively brand [the Conservative Party of Canada] in target communities."

A government spokesperson told The CJN it remains a Conservative priority to "support" Canadians of all ethnic backgrounds.

Irwin Cotler

"We will continue this important work and will make no apologies for it. We won't take communities for granted."

The strategy letter was sent out by the office of MP Jason Kenney, minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, on ministry letterhead.

The staffer who sent the memo has since resigned, and Kenney has apologized for using government resources to promote Conservative party affairs, a violation of parliamentary rules governing ethical standards. Liberal MP for Mount Royal Irwin Cotler was incensed at what he called a "cynical exercise" by the Conservatives, accusing the Harper government of perpetuating ethnic stereotypes.

"Clearly, Jews are the only ethnic group being targeted in Mount Royal," Cotler said. "We are being defined as 'a very ethnic group' which is a cynical and manipulative stereotyping of a group."

Cotler said Jews and other ethnic communities are not "monolithic" in their voting patterns and beliefs.

Referring to the Conservatives' oft-cited support of Israel as part of its allure to the greater Canadian Jewish community, Cotler said that issue is only one of many that resonates with voters.

"As if Jews don't care about health care, the environment or childcare… [Many] Jews do care about Israel, which is fine, but they should not be singled out for fundraising purposes, which is yet another stereotypical ascription."

Law firm to appeal taxi ruling for free

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Arieh Perecowicz stopped fretting about the cost of appealing his recent conviction for carrying contraband items in his taxi the moment he heard last Tuesday morning that a prominent law firm would take it on pro bono as a possibly precedent-setting Charter case.

"I'm ecstatic," the 66-year-old taxi driver told The CJN only minutes after the Montreal law firm of Borden Ladner Gervais (BLG) notified him. "I feel like a new person – reborn."

Arieh Perecowicz

The law firm agreed to represent Perecowicz in Quebec Superior Court at no charge in an effort to overturn his recent Municipal Court conviction for having items in his taxi not related to his job under Bylaw 98 of Montreal's municipal taxi code.

They included Jewish religious items, even though Perecowicz had testified that he kept them in his cab as part of his religious "belief."

Municipal Court Judge Dominique Joly, however, decided that Perecowicz did not "discharge his burden of proof" in his religious freedom argument.

Careful not to reveal his hand, lawyer Mark Phillips, who will represent Perecowicz in court, would only say that "Charter grounds" with respect to religious freedom would be raised in the appeal.

"BLG is one of the leaders in pro bono work," Phillips wrote in an e-mail exchange with The CJN last week. "There are a number of criteria, [but] in short, we take on cases where we feel it is important to make a contribution to the community for a good cause, [and] where the client is unable to pay our normal fee."

He said his next step would be to file a notice of appeal.

Perecowicz said he was on pins and needles over the Feb. 26-27 weekend as a special BLG committee considered the merits of taking on the case for free. He said that even though he was determined to appeal his conviction, he couldn't afford it on his own and had no legal representation.

"This shows that this is a case with national importance," Perecowicz said. "It is not only about my rights, but everybody's rights."

Perecowicz had visited the law firm a week earlier to discuss the merits of the case with BLG's pro bono committee. He was accompanied by Abby Shawn, chair of Quebec Jewish Congress' (QJC) human rights committee.

"We're very pleased with [BLG's] decision," Shawn said in an interview from Florida. "Obviously they find from a legal standpoint there's a lot of interesting questions both on an administrative and human rights constitutional level."

Shawn said that while the freedom of religion and freedom of expression issues raised in Perecowicz's case bore some resemblance to a well-known local case almost a decade ago, in which Jewish owners of condos were forbidden to erect sukkahs on their balconies, there are other issues at play now. (In 2004, the Supreme Court sided with the condo owners.)

"On [religious freedom and freedom of expression], there's definitely some precedent," Shawn said.

"But when you're talking about the real issue, the specific issue in this case about what you're allowed to exhibit in a taxi, whether a taxi is a 'man's castle,' [as well as] how much of your religious freedom you're allowed to exercise and how much the state is allowed to step in and limit those freedoms – I think that that's really going to have be decided really specifically on the facts of this case."

Phillips has significant experience in constitutional litigation.

He most recently won a case on religious freedom grounds in which private Catholic Loyola High School was ruled to be exempt from the ethics and religious culture program imposed on all Quebec schools by the Education Ministry.

Phillips said that in May, he will be arguing a case before the Supreme Court in which "certain parents are seeking an exemption for their children from the same program."

Ayelet Yakira Galena

Search on for bone marrow match for baby girl

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

People in Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere are being asked to have their cheeks painlessly swabbed in a concerted effort to find a bone marrow match and donor as soon as possible for a 15-month-old baby girl diagnosed just a few weeks ago with a deadly bone marrow failure disorder.

"It is extraordinarily rare disorder," said prominent Montreal Rabbi Reuben Poupko, whose daughter, Hindy Poupko Galena, and son-in-law, Seth Galena, received the devastating news about their daughter, Ayelet Yakira Galena.

In Toronto, a "Get Swabbed for Ayelet" bone marrow drive is set for March 13, from 2 to 10 p.m. at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation at 613 Clark Ave. in Thornhill.

Montrealers can join the Héma-Québec Stem Cell Registry by visiting, hema-quebec.qc.ca and clicking on, "The registry of Life…in 3 easy steps" under the "Stem Cells" heading, and joining the registry. A cheek swab test kit will then be sent to them.

Individuals can also make donations on Ayelet's behalf to Gift of Life, at www.giftoflife.org/dc/Ayelet-Galena/blog.aspx.

Ayelet's family lives on Manhattan's Upper West Side. Yeshiva University, Hindy's alma mater, has already held a bone marrow drive on the baby's behalf, and others are in the planning stages.

Interviewed in late February about her daughter's situation on WCBS radio in New York, Hindy, a professional with the city's Jewish Community Relations Council, said, "every day is a risk because [Ayelet's] immune system is basically running at 50 per cent."

The baby was born prematurely, weighing two pounds, nine ounces, with an already-compromised immune system. But her rare and potentially fatal disorder was diagnosed only last month.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Hebrew U, U of M researchers to fight fetal alcohol syndrome

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Researchers from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the University of Manitoba will team up to fight fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS), the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) announced last week.

On Feb. 28, CFHU's Winnipeg chapter held a press conference to announce the venture, the latest such research collaboration between Hebrew U and a Canadian university.

"We are really excited about this," said chapter president Faith Kaplan.

The collaboration will focus on the role of nutrition and genetic and socio-economic factors in FAS, Kaplan said.

Of particular interest is the work of Dr. Abraham Fainsod, a professor of genetics and biochemistry at Hebrew U, who for the past 12 years has been studying the effects of vitamin A on alcohol consumption and biochemistry.

Kaplan said Fainsod's studies indicate that vitamin A and alcohol counteract each other. Therefore, taking vitamin A during pregnancy makes it harder for the body to absorb alcohol and may protect the child.

"It's a brilliant and potentially simple preventative treatment," Kaplan said.

But Fainsod was quick to point out to reporters here last week that taking vitamin A shouldn't be seen as a licence to drink while pregnant.

Too much vitamin A can cause birth defects that mimic the effects of alcohol, he said. And scientists haven't yet figured out what the correct balance might be.

Kaplan noted that Fainsod will be collaborating with Dr. Ab Chudley, the father of FAS research in Manitoba.

"They are excited to be working with each other," she said. "This research could make a difference worldwide."

She said the province of Manitoba will contribute $750,000 to the initiative over the next five years, with CFHU matching that amount.

She noted that Manitoba has a high incidence of FAS, so the research will be of particular importance here. Even moderate consumption of alcohol early in pregnancy can result in a child with FAS. In vitro exposure to alcohol can stunt development of individual brain cells and major parts of the brain.

"We will be holding a major fundraising event in support of this initiative on May 16," Kaplan said. "We will be presenting Joe Bova with a Scopus Award at a gala dinner."

Hebrew U's Scopus Award is the highest honour conferred by the university to individuals who demonstrate leadership and involvement in humanitarian causes. Kaplan said Hebrew U president Menahem Ben-Sasson will be on hand to present the award to Bova.

(Bova isn't Jewish, but the recently retired construction magnate has enjoyed a close working relationship with the Jewish community over the years and had a significant impact on Winnipeg as a whole.)

Three years ago, the Winnipeg chapter of CFHU launched the first joint research venture between Hebrew U and a Canadian school.

That project brought together Prof. Ofer Mandelboim, of Hebrew U's Lautenberg Research Center for General and Tumor Immunology, and Winnipeg's Dr. Frank Plummer, a world-renowned specialist on HIV/AIDS, who together are searching for a vaccine for the disease.

The latest collaboration is one of a number of joint research projects being undertaken by leading Hebrew U researchers and their Canadian medical counterparts in Montreal, Edmonton and Vancouver, as well as Winnipeg, under the umbrella of the Hebrew U's new Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC), an institute for which CFHU has pledged to raise $50 million.

David Frum to speak in Winnipeg

WINNIPEG — Internationally known political analyst David Frum will be making his first official appearance here next month.

He will be in the city on April 28 to deliver the sixth annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture for the Jewish Heritage Centre (JHC) of Western Canada.

The annual program was inaugurated in 2006 in honour of Sol Kanee's 95th birthday. Kanee was one of the leaders of the Jewish community in Winnipeg, as well as one of the world's outstanding Jewish leaders of the 20th century. He died in April 2007.

The Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture is one of the best-attended annual Jewish community events, as well as being the JHC's only major yearly fundraising event.

Among the speakers in whose footsteps Frum will follow are the historians Sir Martin Gilbert and Deborah Lipstadt and, most recently, Dore Gold, a former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations and adviser to both prime ministers Ariel Sharon and Benjamin Netanyahu.

"David Frum is widely known in the United States and Canada as a respected political commentator who has had the ear of power," says Gerry Posner, who is co-chairing the evening with Sheldon Mindell. "He was a speech writer for president [George W.] Bush and coined the phrase 'axis of evil.'"

The Toronto-born Frum is the author of six books, and he is a regular columnist for several newspapers and news services in Canada and the United States. He appears frequently on American Public Media's show Marketplace. Although he is a registered Republican, he led the successful opposition to Bush's attempt to appoint Judge Harriet Miers to the American Supreme Court (liberals and conservatives questioned her qualifications and record). — M.L.

Nova Scotia, Israel hope to increase ties

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Nova Scotia Premier Darrell Dexter and Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, are preparing for closer ties between their governments.

While in opposition a few years ago as leader of Nova Scotia's New Democratic Party, Dexter attended a Canada-Israel Committee mission of Canadian government leaders to Israel. He was entranced with the people and the advances made in various fields, including science and technology, agriculture, business and education.

Now that he's premier, Dexter is hoping to lead a trade mission to Israel this year to increase business and research ties between Nova Scotia and the Jewish state. No date has been set, but discussions are underway.

The premier's chief of staff, Dan O'Connor, met with Ziv last week and came away with enthusiasm for the potential between the province and Israel.

Ties between the Port of Halifax and the Port of Haifa in Israel, as well as research and commercialization of renewable energy sources, are a few areas of potential joint interest, O'Connor said.

"Israel is one of the world's leaders in [research and development] and commercialization of academic work, and that is obviously of interest to Nova Scotia, which proportionately has such a large academic community," O'Connor said.

While in Halifax on March 3, Ziv told a small lunch gathering that Israel is already collaborating with Canada's federal government on three areas of joint interest: renewable energy, water and brain research. The National Research Council of Canada is co-ordinating the projects.

"Canada is a huge country with so many provinces, so the engagement with the provinces is very important to us as well," Ziv said.

She said that she is going "to see how we can expand the relationship between the State of Israel and the province of Nova Scotia."

It was Ziv's third visit to Halifax. She met with the premier during her previous visit in November 2010.

Also in November, the National Research Council hosted a joint technology innovation summit between Canada and Israel in Toronto attended by representatives of universities, industry and government from both countries. A second similar summit is to take place in Israel later this year.

In a statement to The CJN earlier this week, Ziv said she is continuing to "work closely" with the provinces on familiarizing them with all Israel has to offer.

"Ever since I arrived in Ottawa, a key part of my outreach strategy has been to engage with provincial governments, Jewish communities and universities across the country," Ziv said, noting that last year, the premiers of Ontario and Manitoba visited Israel, producing "tangible results, like the formation of the Ontario Brain Institute and its partnership with Israel, and a commercial agreement to help create links between Hebrew University and the University of Manitoba.

"I look forward to continuing to work with the government of Nova Scotia, as well as Canada's other provinces, in advancing relations between Israel and Canada."

Persian food from a new perspective

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

There's no better time to experience an authentic Persian meal than on Purim. Persian Food from the Non-Persian Bride is Reyna Simnegar's first cookbook, and it's an intriguing and fun read.

Reyna's family history dates back to the Spanish Inquisition, when her family fled from Spain and eventually landed in Venezuela. Reyna was born in Caracas and moved to Los Angeles in 1995 to study at UCLA. There she met her Persian husband, Sammy, and when he decided to move to New York City to attend graduate school, Reyna decided to follow him. Sammy's mother, afraid that her son would starve in New York without authentic Persian food, hosted Reyna for a week and taught her the intimate secrets of Persian cuisine. The rest is culinary history.

In spite of being from two different cultures, Reyna and Sammy eventually married and now live in Brookline, Mass., with their five lively boys.

Reyna writes, "It was crucial for me that all my recipes be as easy to make as possible without sacrificing taste. Marinate it overnight? The last thing I want to do with my evening is to be rubbing chicken legs with sauce! Forget it!

"I have witnessed with horror how much oil can go into Persian food. All my recipes are designed to keep the fat out of your food. Feel free to use my recipes as a starting point and make your own repertoire of recipes that will suit your family's needs. There is life beyond kugel!"

Reyna's recipes show step-by-step how to create meals for all occasions regardless of how pressed for time and how inexperienced you may be. Illustrated with more than 100 full-colour photographs that accompany each recipe, the book includes indispensable lists of must-haves and menus for all of the Jewish holidays.

The day before Purim is a fast day known as the Fast of Esther. In Iran, Persian Jews traditionally broke the fast with delicious Persian halvah, which is also one of the staple foods to give away in mishloach manot bundles. Whereas we use graggers when Haman's name is mentioned, back in Iran they used to use firecrackers!

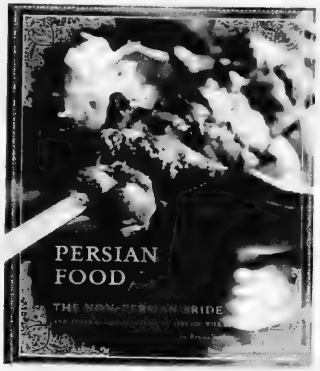
Reyna's personality shines through on every page and the photographs are gorgeous. Her delightful cookbook will inspire you to broaden your culinary horizons and enter her wonderful world of Persian food, simplified. She suggests easily available options if you are unable to find ingredients that are not always available.

When Reyna and I spoke on the phone, she suggested the following recipes for your enjoyment!

PERSIAN HALVAH

Persian halvah is not like the regular halvah you are used to. The word halvah refers to several dense and sweet desserts made with nuts or flour. In contrast to the more popular Israeli halvah made of sesame paste, in Iran, halvah is flour-based with a hint of rose water. I actually think Persian halvah is way better! It has a soft, play-dough consistency that is agreeable to the palate. The taste is heavenly and exotic! Persian halvah is intertwined in many areas of the life of Persian Jews, especially its connection to Purim.

It is important to mix the dough very well. If too many flour lumps remain, process in the pot with an immersion hand blender until a thick paste is achieved. To serve, flatten dough into a shallow platter and garnish with slivered pistachios and almonds. Since this dough is very pliable, children can enjoy helping shape halvah with cookie cutters in a myriad of shapes and sizes.



Syrup
1 1/2 cups water
1 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. saffron
1 tsp. cardamom powder
1/4 cup rose water
Dough
2 cups flour
1 cup canola oil
slivered pistachios and/or almonds for garnish

To make the syrup, bring water and sugar to a boil in a 4-quart saucepan. When sugar has dissolved, turn off the heat; add saffron, cardamom and rose water. Stir and set aside.

Dipping the veal in this pesto a real treat

In another 4-quart saucepan, toast flour over high heat for no more than 3 minutes, stirring constantly with a wooden spoon to avoid burning. Watch carefully – as soon as the flour becomes light brown, reduce heat to medium and add oil. Cook for 1 minute, stirring constantly.

Add syrup and mix rapidly. Almost immediately bright yellow dough, similar to play dough, will form.

To serve, flatten dough into a shallow, round platter and garnish with slivered pistachios and almonds, or cut into shapes and garnish. Yield: 9-in. round halvah.

VEAL OR LAMB CHOPS WITH PERSIAN PESTO

You can substitute the veal chops for lamb chops or chicken breasts. By the way, make extra pesto because your guests will like it so much they will want to dip every bite of veal in it!

Pesto

4 garlic cloves
1 cup parsley, washed and chopped
1 cup dill, washed and chopped
1/2 cup olive oil
3 scallions chopped
1 lime, juiced or 2 tbsp. bottled lime juice
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 tsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. lemon omani (dehydrated limes) or the zest of a lime

6 large veal chops
1 tbsp. ziadune (nigella) seeds or black sesame seeds (optional garnish)
fresh parsley

Preheat oven to broil. Spray 2 large baking trays with canola oil. Set aside. Using a small food processor, mix all pesto ingredients together until fully combined.

Place the chops on the baking trays and spread pesto on both sides. Reserve some pesto for garnish. Broil the chops for 8 minutes. Carefully remove pans from oven, turn over the chops and broil for 5 more minutes or until nicely browned.

Serve on a platter, garnished with some of the pesto sauce, ziadune seeds and fresh parsley. Yield: 6 servings.

TOMATO PERSIAN RICE (POLO GERMEZ)

Simnegar called this her favourite rice. "However, the children love it as well. When people ask me how many kids I have, I usually tell them I have five boys (thank God.) That was the case until one day I caught my husband eating this rice and snatching some from the children's plates while they were not looking. From then on, if people asked me how many kids I have, I answer, 'I have five boys and a husband!'"

Make sure to have a colander ready in the sink to drain the rice. When cooking the tadig, make sure the paper towels are safely away from the heat.

3 cups basmati rice, checked and rinsed
1 (28-oz.) can crushed tomatoes
3 cups water
1/2 cup canola oil
1 1/2 tbsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground saffron (optional)
1 large onion, diced

Fill a 6-quart nonstick saucepan with rice, tomatoes, water, canola oil, salt, saffron and onion. Mix together. Cover and bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat to medium-low. Simmer for 10 minutes.

Uncover and place 2 paper towels (one on top of the other) over the rice. The ends will extend outside the pot. Replace the lid tightly. Reduce heat to low and simmer for 30 minutes.

Turn off the heat and tilt the lid to allow the steam to escape so that the crunchy bottom does not become soggy.

Serve on a shallow platter, mounding the rice into a pyramid. Yield: 8 servings.

Nazarian Foundation a paragon of Persian Jewry and philanthropy

Cyrus Neekpour
Special to The CJN

Since the birth of the Jewish state in 1948, migration of Jews from different parts of the world to their new homeland has generated fascinating stories of perseverance, dedication and love.

These stories continue to be a source of inspiration for the descendants of early Jewish migrants whose contributions to the development of Israel as a modern state have been fundamental.

The Nazarian family has a special place in the collective Jewish journey, both for Persian Jewry and for young Israelis who need to know how the story of Israel started to unfold.

The CJN recently interviewed Sharon Nazarian Baradaran, the president of Y&S Nazarian Family Foundation, based in Los Angeles, Calif.

The Nazarian Foundation was founded in 2000 by Younes Nazarian and his wife, Soraya, and is presently run under the leadership of Baradaran, the third of their four children.

Sharon Nazarian Baradaran

Baradaran, the mother of three, is an executive, academic and ardent supporter of Israeli and Persian Jewish causes. Born in Iran, Baradaran has a PhD in political science from the University of Southern California.

Nazarian Enterprises, part of the foundation, is run by David Nazarian, the eldest sibling. SBE is an entertainment group that owns several high-end hotels, restaurants and nightclubs run by the youngest of the siblings, Sam Nazarian, who Business Week magazine once called the "emperor of cool."

But the seeds of Nazarian success in philanthropy and business were sown decades ago by the hard work of Younes Nazarian.

A native of Tehran, he migrated to the newly established Jewish state at the age of 17. He returned to Iran at a time of economic prosperity under the Shah, a period that also marked great economic achievements by Jewish Iranians.

Nazarian prospered in road construction and equipment, and later married Soraya. The family remained in Iran until the social upheaval of 1978 that overthrew the Shah's government and turned the lives of millions of Iranians upside down, including many Persian Jews.

The family first relocated to Israel, where they spent one year before making their journey to Los Angeles.

Baradaran said her parents are a source of inspiration for many in the Jewish community, both in the United States and Israel.

She is inspired by her mother, Soraya, she said, who is one of the founders of the foundation and a gifted sculptor with great passion for the arts and culture.

Her passion for the arts, said Baradaran, is manifested by investments in music and dance academies in Israel, as well as inner-city art programs in Los Angeles.

The beauty of Soraya's efforts, she said, lie in the use of the arts as a tool for teaching tolerance and confidence-building in different communities of different ethnic and religious backgrounds, not just Jewish communities.

The Y&S Nazarian Family Foundation has invested in institutions of learning at all levels, nurturing new programs that enhance the learning experience of students. One of the foundation's recent contributions was the Younes and Soraya Nazarian Center for Israel Studies at the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA.) The foundation has been particularly focused on public policy research concerning the state of Israel, such as long-term strategic planning, including energy policy, safety/police/law enforcement and the development of the Galilee and Negev regions.

But the philanthropic works of the Nazarian family extends beyond the foundation. In 2003, the Nazarians founded the Ima Foundation as their regional office in Tel Aviv. The work of the Ima Foundation, named after the family's paternal grandmother, is focused exclusively on Israel by investing in the future of Israelis through education as the most important vehicle to narrow the country's social and economic gaps.

Baradaran displayed her knowledge of political economy by offering a unique perspective on Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and his administration. She said that Ahmadinejad's rhetoric against Israel should be seen within the context of Iran's internal political dynamics.

For Ahmadinejad, Baradaran said, it's important to have an external threat acting as a source of Iran's many socio-economic problems.

Regarding Israeli-Iranian tensions, she said the intense strategic rivalry between the two countries has the potential to get out of control with disastrous consequences. Therefore, it's important that Israel and the West embrace policies that further contribute to the decline of the Iranian regime's status on the world stage and uncover its ideological bankruptcy.

Developing and Nurturing Independence

It is quite simple, actually. Our children with challenges deserve the same choices as their siblings or peers. The route may be different and the obstacles may feel insurmountable-but they will get there, no doubt.

Our children want to be valued.
Our children need to have a meaningful day.
Our children are able to contribute.
Our children enjoy relationships with friends, family, neighbours, community.
Our children deserve a good life.

Danny loves to daven, Yakov is a whiz at math, Laurence teaches fire safety and Racheli can slice and dice. Jesse S loves to play piano and Jesse G. helps clean our yard. Sar and Shayna love music, Melanie helps in the kitchen, Mikhail explains GICs and mortgage rates, Alex plays drums and Ryan is a charmer. Jenny wears funky earrings, Terry mediates peace with her gentle demeanour, Talya cares for the seniors and Marty is voted the best counselor. Rebecca loves to hop and skip, Guitti got all the answers in Jewish jeopardy and Josh dances with heart.

One of DANI's goals is an emotional transition from a state of learned helplessness to supported independence, from the child who remains silent and told by others what to do to the adult who can advocate for himself and create his own life.

DANI has many programs; weekday/ Sunday program, after school integrated basketball and music programs, camps and holiday celebrations. The young adults prepare packages for Chai- Lifeline, Tomchei Shabbos, women's shelters and sing for seniors. They have a "Mi Sheberach" hotline and have begun volunteering when possible. Now they are learning vocational skills with a catering venture from our active, professional COR kitchen.

We rely solely upon fees from parents, minor projects and one annual gala. All monies raised are devoted entirely to enhancing the program and the lives of our young adults. DANI supports young adults as they assume their rightful place in the Jewish community while gently enveloping parents in their daily roller coaster existence.

Please join us for an unforgettable evening of joyful music and enthusiastic young adults. I guarantee you will be inspired and return home a changed person.

New project in Israel will serve special needs adults

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Judith Edelman-Green is bursting with ideas for a project she anticipates will become a reality within a few years.

Rimon Village – an outgrowth of the Rimon Community, a non-profit organization that the rabbi founded in 2006 – will house and serve special needs adults in Kvar Sava, north of Tel Aviv, including deaf adults who are also developmentally disabled. The city has granted it two acres of land.

Ground-breaking for the $11-million campus is expected to take place in December. Plans include a synagogue, a sports centre with a therapy pool, bicycle paths for adult tricycles, a room where residents can invite their parents for Shabbat dinner, and a tallit-making workshop that will provide employment to residents.

Because the Israeli government provides operating costs for adults with special needs, only the building needs to be funded, Rabbi Edelman-Green told The CJN on a recent visit to Toronto that included a series of informal parlour meetings. About one-third of the cost has been raised so far.

From 1995 to 2004, Rabbi Edelman-Green was national director of the Masorti Movement's Bar/Bat Mitzvah for the Special Child program, which she founded. That work ultimately led to her involvement with adults who have special needs. The Rimon Community has 70 people on its books, she said.

The name Rimon, which means pomegranate, is symbolic in part because of the 613 seeds said to be in the pomegranate, representing all the mitzvot, she explained in an interview at the office of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

As well, the pomegranate is one of the seven species of the land of Israel. "That's a statement," the rabbi said. "You may not be a date or a fig, but you can be a pomegranate and be part of it. It's also red, vibrant and very beautiful."

Ordained in 2009 from Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem, the 52-year-old Wisconson native has lived in Israel for 26 years. Her husband, a physician, is British. The couple, who have three children, met as high school students when her father took a sabbatical in London.

Rabbi Edelman-Green, who considers herself above all a Jewish educator, has always been passionate about Jewish studies, she said.

With two master's degrees – one in Jewish studies from the Masorti movement's Schechter Institute for Judaic Studies, and one in Jewish thought from Ben-Gurion University – Edelman-Green decided to study for the rabbinate because she felt the special needs community "needed a rabbi as their advocate."

The rabbi – who was ordained Reform, but considers herself non-denominational – works with families from haredi to secular.

She said she prefers to focus on abilities, rather than disabilities.

Rabbi Edelman-Green envisions a place built around Jewish values. To the best of her knowledge, it will be the only one of its kind in Israel.

"We'll have a beit midrash for people who can't read. How do you teach Torah to someone who can't study books? As well as having a physical place to study, we'll take people out to our little strip of land and do agriculture."

While working the land, residents will learn appropriate blessings, and about Jewish values like setting aside crops for the poor.

Among the types of work she plans to offer is the opportunity to befriend the elderly. She noted that Meir Medical Center is nearby, and said that residents would bring therapy dogs to visit elderly and sick patients.

Fines often deter mothers

Family Matters

Question: How many mothers have been sent to jail or fined for not letting their children see their father? Are fathers getting more rights or are the courts biased to the mother? If you have a court order to see your children can you call the police to enforce the order? In a previous article you mentioned that you can record your phone conversations but will the court allow such evidence? When do the courts start listening to the children and how often are the children's wishes granted?

Answer: Although courts are reluctant to send mothers to jail, they are far less reluctant to fine them. However, if a mother is indeed proving to be difficult a judge issues an order for her to comply with a threat that the next time she will be imprisoned. At the same time the court often orders the mother to reimburse the father for his legal costs, usually a few thousand dollars. An accumulation of these costs alone can dissuade a mother from acting unwisely. After a number of such warnings and fines the courts have, on occasion, jailed mothers. It is therefore more the court process and the attendant fines and/or costs that lead to results, rather than jail itself.

In the course of such proceedings, additional methods such as a court application to switch the child's custody can also be effective. You can call the police to enforce an access order only if the order specifically asks the police to assist in the enforcement. Courts have become increasingly sensitive to the rights of fathers and their need to have maximum contact with their children.

However, much depends upon how well their case in represented in court, which often means how much money you have or how much Legal Aid will fund (if you qualify). At the same time if abuse is an issue, and the woman is well represented, the courts will carefully protect a child or his mother. But once again arranging for qualified legal representation is key.

Yes, the court will allow as evidence conversations you have tape recorded on your own phone.

Courts consider a child's wishes based on his maturity and needs, not his age, and not directly. However, the court will listen very carefully to any child who has attained the age of 13. A child must be represented by the government through the "children's lawyer" appointed by the court.

Prejudice is starting to yield to inclusion

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

About two per cent of the Israeli population – an estimated 200,000 people – are "mentally challenged," according to Haim Gurfinkel, general manager of Ami, an organization in Be'er Sheva that serves adults with developmental disabilities.

Ami's Beit Cohen (named for Montreal funder Leonard Cohen – not the poet) serves 74 adults with Down Syndrome and other developmental disabilities. They live in six buildings that are arranged in a circle. "It's like a neighbourhood," Gurfinkel told The CJN on a visit to Toronto in November.

Beit Cohen shares some aspects of the to-be-built Rimon Village.

Although there is no Jewish component on site, residents have jobs like gardening or animal care, or they do kitchen work in the army. The compound has outdoor adult-sized playground equipment, and a typical day includes exercise as well as work.

Some of Ami's 350 clients are housed at Beit Cohen; others are in apartments that the organization rents for them.

Beit Cohen – like the proposed Rimon Village – is unusual in Israel because, typically, high functioning developmentally disabled adults live in apartments, and those who are lower functioning live in institutions or with elderly parents, Gurfinkel said.

"They're warm people," he said of the clients, all of whom he said he knows personally. But they sometimes face prejudice and isolation. "It's also part of our work to change this mentality," Gurfinkel said. "We fight in court... if a hotel doesn't want to take us [for example]. The law is good, but the people don't understand. It's not a 'sexy' cause."

Rabbi Judith Edelman-Green has seen prejudice, but only rarely. "I think there is a change going on in society. I do hear parents talking about prejudice, but I also hear a lot about inclusion."

Living 'with dignity'

As well, the rabbi would like to run a certificate course at a local technical college on befriending the elderly. "Very often, adults with special needs have never graduated from anything."

Rimon Village "will be a place to live, a place to work with dignity.

"We want to run a very healthy, delicious coffee house where we grow our own fruits for juices, and we grow herbs outside, where you can go pick them for omelets. Mint for teas. Healthy, delicious food served with a smile."

"In my head, it's already there."

Emotional states affect our eating habits, author

Rena Godfrey
Special to The CJN

Many of us choose to eat just because we feel like it, but not because we're actually hungry. What are we thinking about when we decide to inhale a mega-sized hamburger or decadent chocolate brownie? Or, are we not thinking at all?

Ara Wiseman, a Toronto-based nutritionist and lecturer, is the author of Feed Your Body, Feed Your Soul, a nutrition self-help book that reveals the connections between the foods we eat and our overall health and well-being. Wiseman focuses on how our emotional states affect our eating habits, and she said she's confident that readers will benefit from her 13 years of private practice in nutritional and spiritual counselling.

"Most of us have lost the connection between what we are eating, why we are eating, who we are feeding and how we feel inside. Eating can be a distraction – junk food laden with fat, sugar and chemicals, can suppress emotions providing false emotional comfort. We forget what it feels like to be nourished," she said.

"If you see yourself as healthy and vibrant, you will choose to eat foods that are healthy and alive, but if you see yourself as overweight and heavy, you will likely select foods that are heavy and laden with sodium, sugar or unhealthy fat."

Wiseman said she believes first and foremost in establishing a healthy relationship with food. "The most important ingredient in achieving a balanced diet is awareness and an understanding of the impact that our food choices have on our health," she said. "A balanced diet equates to a balanced approach to life where you consider the energy of the food you are about to consume. Therefore, the thought of eating junk food or fast food would have no appeal – over time it destroys cells and tissue while robbing your body of nutrients."

Wiseman said that nutrient-dense foods should be included in our daily lives to ensure optimum health. She recommends fruits and vegetables – raw, grilled or steamed – homemade vegetable soups, stir-fries, whole grains, legumes, squash, chlorophyll-rich plant foods, greens, raw nuts and seeds, sunflower sprouts, broccoli sprouts and sprouted grains.

Feed Your Body, Feed Your Soul encourages the reader to reflect on his or her own personal eating habits, which Wiseman asserts is the first step in achieving a healthy and happy life.

"If you pause every time you are about to eat and ask yourself, 'Am I nourishing myself with this food I'm about to eat?' it will help you become more mindful of your choices. When you approach your goals with love and understanding, the solutions will come to you more easily," she said.

"We need to take responsibility for our health. Enjoy the movement of your body and be grateful that you can walk, run, bike, swim, skate, work out, and do yoga. When we are full of gratitude, it is hard to not to be happy."

Feed Your Body, Feed Your Soul is available on Amazon.com, and in Toronto at the Whole Foods Market, Qi Natural Foods on Eglinton Avenue West, The Big Carrot and at Nature's Emporium, Aurora. www.arawiseman.com

New program offers after-school activities to sick kids

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Chai Lifeline's Shining Star programs gives children who are sick or have special needs a chance to feel part of the crowd.

Offered once a week at the Prosserman JCC, the program offers kids ages four to 12, and their siblings, the opportunity to take part in activities together.

Rabbi Mordechai Rothman, director of Chai Lifeline Canada – an organization that provides emotional and financial support to families battling life-threatening and chronic pediatric illness – said the idea for the program came about when he saw the children at summer camp and realized how happy they were there.

"I wanted them to have the same fun at an afternoon program. They watch their siblings take part in activities, but there was really no place for them to go, so we created a program for them."

It also gives parents the opportunity to have a dinner at home, he said, "and let them regroup – their kids get door-to-door transportation – in order to be the best parents they can be. The benefits of the program are two-fold."

The program started in September – the Prosserman JCC donates the space – as a pilot with about 15 kids, "but we have seen positive results. The kids are having fun and making friends. We feel we're giving them something every week."

Children take part in Chai Lifeline's Shining Star program activities.

Activities are tailored to everyone, he said, so "even those in wheelchairs can take part."

He said that some participants who are older than the others come in to help out, "so they are also taking advantage of what we have to offer."

Rabbi Rothman said that it is a privilege for him to be part of Chai Lifeline. "This job is amazing for me. I go to work every day and feel good about what we do. I get to see the good side of people, I see a smile on a child's face, and I see parents' relief. There is nothing more powerful."

Coalition to press UN on Iran human rights

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States will strongly support a Swedish effort to have the UN Human Rights Council appoint a special investigator into rights violations in Iran, U.S Ambassador Eileen Donahoe said on Friday.

She told a news briefing the idea had backing from a wide range of countries in the 47-nation council – including members of the self-styled non-aligned group (NAM), who normally unite to shield each other from criticism.

Earlier this week, Swedish State Secretary for Foreign Affairs Frank Belfrage told the five-year-old rights body his country was deeply concerned by "the worsening human rights situation in Iran."

He said the number of executions in Iran so far this year had reached alarming proportions. "The most horrendous methods of killing human beings are still being used. Taking a person's life by stoning them is nothing less than barbaric," he added.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton told the council that Iran pursued "violence abroad and tyranny at home." Iranian rights activists wanted a UN investigator, she added.

"The resolution that is being pursued has a lot of support from across the regions because Iran is an extreme case," Donahoe said on Friday. "We will be working with Sweden very hard on this."

UN rights chief Navi Pillay says there has been a wave of arrests of opponents and critics of the Iranian government, apparently prompted by popular uprisings in nearby Arab states, and the text will refer to this.

If passed, it would set up a post of special rapporteurs, or investigators, to monitor Iran's compliance with international rights agreements it has signed and to report regularly to the council.

Co-sponsors of the resolution include the Maldives, an Indian ocean archipelago which is a member with Iran of the 57-nation Organization of Islamic States (OIC), and Zambia, part of the African group, Donahoe said.

OIC and African countries are part of the wider – and majority – NAM bloc in the council, as well as in the UN General Assembly, which, with the support of Russia, China and Cuba, can usually control its agenda.

But the bloc broke apart last week when a European Union resolution condemning attacks on unarmed protesters by Libyan government security forces and recommending Libya's expulsion from the council was approved by consensus.

That resolution had been formally supported by four OIC states. The General Assembly agreed unanimously to suspend Libya's membership in the Geneva rights forum.

Diplomats said it would still be hard to get an Iran resolution passed as most members of the NAM group and their Russian and Chinese supporters strongly oppose having UN special investigators looking into one country's affairs.

IAEA equivocates on Iranian nukes

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

VIENNA — The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency said Monday that he cannot guarantee that Iran is not trying to develop atomic arms.

Speaking at the start of a 35-nation IAEA board meeting, Yukiya Amano, who heads the UN nuclear watchdog, said he cannot give Iran's nuclear program a clean bill of health because Tehran is refusing to co-operate with an IAEA probe of its programs.

Amano also said that Syria is stonewalling an investigation of a site suspected to have been a secretly built reactor that would have produced plutonium once finished. Israeli warplanes destroyed that structure three years ago.

On Sunday, western diplomats said that Iran and Syria's alleged nuclear activities were high on the agenda for the IAEA board meeting in Vienna on Monday, but no action against them was expected to take place for now.

The IAEA recently received new information concerning possible military nuclear activities in Iran, it said in a report late last month, without giving details.

The report also highlighted previous allegations about seven Iranian research or development projects for a nuclear warhead that officials in Tehran have refused to explain. Iran says the intelligence is fabricated.

In its Syria report, Amano said the country has not allowed additional inspections either of a suspected nuclear reactor that Israel bombed in 2007 or of three possibly related sites that his inspectors have not yet visited.

The IAEA is aware that according to intelligence information, one of the sites could have been set up to make reactor fuel, diplomats said.

However, Syria decided a week before the board meeting that it would allow a visit to a fourth location, a civilian chemical plant that produces uranium as a by-product.

While diplomats acknowledged that Syria's blocking undermines the IAEA's authority, they questioned what a resolution or a so-called special inspection would achieve at this point.

A diplomat said Sunday it was difficult to take action on Syria also because of its complex connection with Middle Eastern politics, referring to the tendency of developing countries on the board to support Israel's perceived enemies.

Besides these questions of tactics, diplomats said their capitals are not focused on these two nuclear issues right now, but rather on the political upheavals in the Middle East and North Africa.

In related developments, Zimbabwe's foreign minister told the Iranian ISNA news agency last Thursday that his country was willing to work with Iran on extracting uranium resources meant for Tehran's nuclear program. Last month a new intelligence report claimed that Iran was expanding its covert global search for the uranium it needs for its nuclear activities and a key focus is Zimbabwe.

The report is in line with international assessments that Iran's domestic supplies cannot sustain its nuclear program that could be turned toward making weapons.

Speaking of the issue during an official visit to Tehran, Zimbabwean Foreign Minister Simbarashe Mumbengegwi told ISNA that "Zimbabwe holds rich resources, but the problem we face is lack of budget, finance and required technical equipment to take the very rich resources out and use them."

Mumbengegwi then criticized western attempts to sanction Iran over its nuclear program, saying that "those making claims on Iran's enrichment work hold nuclear weapons and hostile nuclear program.

"Any country has the right to use peaceful nuclear energy based on international rules," he added. Regarding the sanctions imposed both on Iran and his own country, the Zimbabwean foreign minister said that restrictions "against the two countries are not accidental.

"Western states follow the approach of sanction towards countries which do not yield to their domination and act against their interests," Mumbengegwi said, adding that "any impartial observer can testify that the southern African country [Zimbabwe] is one of the most democratic countries in the continent and has never violated human rights."

The Zimbabwean official also said that any "sanction should be approved by the UN General Assembly since it involves many countries and it should not be allowed that few countries misuse other ones."

Iran says it is enriching solely to power a future network of nuclear reactors. But it has been targeted by UN sanctions because enrichment can also create fissile warhead material and because of its nuclear secrecy and refusal to co-operate with IAEA probes into its activities.

Israel viewed negatively: poll

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — A poll conducted by the BBC revealed last week that Israel is one of the most negatively viewed countries in the world, ranking at the bottom of the chart along with Iran, North Korea and Pakistan.

In 2011, 22 out of 27 countries leaned toward a negative view of Israel, headed by Egypt, Turkey, and Indonesia. The countries which had the most positive view of Israel were the United States, Russia, Ghana, and China.

Participants were asked in a questionnaire, "Please tell me if you think each of the following countries is having a mainly positive or mainly negative influence in the world," giving the options "mainly positive, mainly negative, depends" and "neutral."

The order of popularity of the 16 countries, based on 27 countries that were surveyed, was Germany, United Kingdom, Japan, Canada, France, United States, Brazil, China, South Africa, India, South Korea, Russia, Israel, Pakistan, North Korea, and Iran.

Despite Israel's extremely low ranking, it has actually made a slight improvement in its world standing since 2010, and a more significant improvement since 2007. According to the poll, positive views of Israel increased by 2 per cent while negative views remained mostly same as in 2010.

However, while positive ratings by the United States have remained stable in the poll since 2010 at about 43 per cent, many more Americans chose to rate Israel negatively in 2011, marking an increase of 10 per cent since 2010.

Moreover, negative perceptions of Israel grew stronger in Britain, Canada, Indonesia, Australia, Portugal, Spain, and Kenya.

Pope praised for views on death of Christ

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu praised Pope Benedict XVI for his exoneration of the Jewish People for the death of Jesus Christ.

Pope Benedict, in his new book, portions of which were published March 2, tackles one of the most controversial issues in Christianity, using biblical and theological analysis to discredit the belief that the Jewish People as a whole were responsible for Jesus' death.

Netanyahu sent a message to the Pope last Thursday, thanking him for dispelling the belief "which was used as a basis to hate Jews for hundreds of years.

"It is my hope that this display of clarity and courage will strengthen the relations between Jews and Christians around the world," the prime minister's message stated.

Netanyahu also expressed hope that Pope Benedict's exoneration in Part 2 of Jesus of Nazareth, would "aid the advancement of peace" for generations to come.

Jewish scholars also praised the argument laid out in the Pope's new book. While the Vatican has for five decades taught that Jews were not collectively responsible, Jewish scholars say that Pope Benedict's exoneration will help fight antisemitism today.

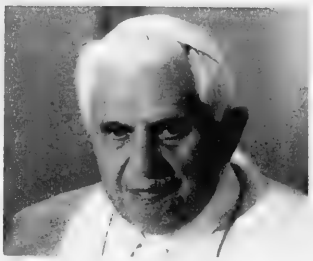
Michael Marrus, the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe professor emeritus of Holocaust studies at the University of Toronto, noted that "although Pope Benedict's 'exoneration' is really just a reaffirmation of the Vatican II Council's historic [1965] statement, Nostra Aetate, it is welcome nevertheless.

"It is also a reminder that with Catholicism, as indeed with Judaism and all the world's great religions, sacred texts are subject to interpretation, and these interpretations can advance the cause of reason and justice. And as with Judaism, this process is not always easy or unanimous. Slowly, however, the world changes, and we hope for the better," Marrus added.

Pope Benedict's first volume of Jesus of Nazareth, his first book as Pope, offered a very personal meditation on the early years of Christ's life and teachings. This second instalment, set to be released March 10, concerns the second half of Christ's life, his death and resurrection.

Pope Benedict XVI's theological analysis contradicts traditional Catholic interpretations that have been used throughout history to justify antisemitism.

Jewish organizations are hailing Pope Benedict XVI's unequivocal repudiation of the claim that the Jewish People can be held forever responsible for the death of Jesus.



Pope Benedict XVI

The landmark document, Nostra Aetate, opened the door to formal Catholic-Jewish dialogue. But in his latest book, Pope Benedict employs a detailed scholarly analysis of Catholic teaching to make the point clear.

The Anti-Defamation League called it "an important and historic moment" in Catholic-Jewish relations that would build on Nostra Aetate.

"Now we must ask: 'Who exactly were Jesus' accusers? Who insisted that he be condemned to death?'" Pope Benedict writes in a passage regarding Jesus' condemnation to death by Roman governor Pontius Pilate.

Noting that the Gospel of St. John states that it was "the Jews," he asks, "How could the whole people have been present at this moment to clamour for Jesus' death?" John's use of the term, he writes, "does not in any way indicate – as the modern reader might suppose – the people of Israel in general, even less is it 'racist' in character. After all, John himself was ethnically a Jew, as were Jesus and all his followers."

What John meant by "the Jews," Benedict writes, was the priestly "Temple aristocracy."

In another passage, Pope Benedict explicitly rejects the notion that the statement reported in the Gospel that "his blood be on us and on our children" meant an eternal curse against the Jewish People. Instead, the Pontiff writes, "it means that we all stand in need of the purifying power of love which is his blood. These words are not a curse, but rather redemption, salvation."

Elan Steinberg, vice-president of the American Gathering of Holocaust Survivors and Their Descendants, said the Pope's book marks "a landmark moment" in Catholic-Jewish relations.

"Pope Benedict's theological repudiation of the deicide charge not only confirms the teachings of Vatican II, which formally rejected collective Jewish guilt, but seals it for a new generation of Catholics," Steinberg said.

IDF pleased with system

The Israeli military takes an offensive approach to battle. If war breaks out, military units are sent to the front line to face the enemy. The Armored Corps is a vital component. It attempts to capture and hold strategic positions behind enemy lines and supports the infantry troops. A high survival rate of the Armored Corps during war is tactically vital in battle, as well as for troop morale.

In December, the IDF tested the Windbreaker system. Originally, a fully armed missile was to be used, but because of pressure from the bereaved families of fallen soldiers and doubts about the system, an unarmed missile was used. The test was successful.

Senior IDF officers are pleased with the first-ever successful deployment of the system in a battle situation. According to some officers, the Windbreaker system changes the military equation in the region. Several groups in Gaza are known to hold hundreds of different antitank missiles.

The estimated price of a Windbreaker system is nearly $300,000 (US).

Israel Briefs

Is interim deal in the plans?

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu reportedly is considering seeking a long-term interim peace deal with the Palestinians that would include the establishment of a Palestinian state with temporary borders. The impetus for an interim deal comes as peace talks between the two sides have broken down. The possibility of working out an interim deal was published last week in several Israeli newspapers citing unnamed sources in the Prime Minister's Office. Ha'aretz reported that the plan would include a Palestinian state. During the interim peace, Israel and the Palestinians could continue to negotiate a final status deal, according to the reports. "Of course, Israel would prefer a final status peace agreement, but that has become all but impossible because of the Palestinian refusal to negotiate," an unnamed government official told CNN. "We are looking at options for steps forward that will help lead to a two-state solution and move the process forward." The Quartet on the Middle East – the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the United States – met last Wednesday in Brussels to discuss how to advance the peace process. Netanyahu did not send a representative to the meeting after being told there would be no meeting between the Israeli and Palestinian representatives. The Palestinians have said they will not resume talks with Israel until all settlement construction is frozen in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem.

No Holocaust education for Hamas

Hamas said it will stop the United Nations from teaching Palestinian children in Gaza about the Holocaust. The history of the Holocaust is set to become part of a human rights curriculum in Gaza schools run by the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) that are attended by more than 200,000 Palestinian children, the Guardian reported. "We cannot agree to a program that is intended to poison the minds of our children," said a statement from Hamas' ministry for refugee affairs. "Holocaust studies in refugee camps is a contemptible plot and serves the Zionist entity with a goal of creating a reality and telling stories in order to justify acts of slaughter against the Palestinian people." The Hamas statement said that the UNRWA should focus on teaching about human rights of Palestinians, the Guardian reported.

Egypt won't restore gas to Israel

An Egyptian company will not resume delivering natural gas to Israel as expected, one month after its pipeline was sabotaged. The East Mediterranean Gas consortium, which supplies 45 per cent of the gas needed to produce Israel's electricity, has missed four promised deadlines to reinstate the gas supply since the pipeline was damaged in a terrorist explosion Feb. 5. The attack was part of the uprising in Egypt that ousted president Hosni Mubarak. The Israel Electric Company has requested permission from Israel's Environmental Protection Ministry to use diesel and fuel oil to run the power plant, Ha'aretz reported.

Protest against children's evictions

Relief organizations staged a demonstration in Tel Aviv last Friday in a renewed effort to prevent the deportation of foreign workers' children, which is expected imminently. The deportation of families that do not meet the criteria set by the Israeli government is expected to commence in the coming week. Hundreds of people demonstrated at a Tel Aviv park, calling on the government not to deport or incarcerate children that were born in Israel. The demonstration was organized by relief organizations, including the Center for Assistance of Foreign Workers, the Civil Rights Union, Doctors for Civil Rights and others. A counter-protest took place at the entrance to Meir Park, where the relief organizations were demonstrating, with south Tel Aviv residents shouting, "Enough with the baby visas!"

Israel works to improve conditions for Palestinians

Alan Elsner
The Israel Project

JERUSALEM — Amid all the talk of Jewish settlements in the disputed territories, Israel's quiet work to help improve conditions for Palestinians often goes unnoticed.

The effects of these efforts are apparent in the substantial economic improvement in the West Bank, including nine per cent GDP growth in 2010, lower unemployment and record tourism.

Among the steps taken to boost the Palestinian economy:

• Despite security risks, in the past two years Israel has dramatically reduced the number of roadblocks in the West Bank from 44 to 16.

• Israel has invested tens of millions of shekels in upgrading the crossings between Israel and the territory. Roughly 5,000 vehicles pass through the crossing on weekends, while weekday traffic volume through the crossing is 500 to 800 vehicles per day.

• The number of entry permits to Israel for Palestinians rose 11 per cent in the first half of 2010 to 22,910, compared to the same period in 2009.

• Israel is working with partners in the international community to establish industrial zones in Bethlehem and Jericho and is helping the Palestinian Authority to establish an industrial zone in Jalameh.

• Israel recently granted an additional megahertz of bandwidth to the new Palestinian cellular telephone provider Wataniya.

• A large electric project has been approved, with financing from the European Investment Bank (EIB). Substations will be built in Jenin, Ramallah, Nablus and Hebron at an estimated cost of 100 million euros.

• In the last two years, Israel's Customs Authority held several training sessions for Palestinian customs officials. An agreement for co-operation regarding computerized information is expected to be signed in the near future between the two customs authorities.

Construction activity in the West Bank increased by 22 per cent in 2009. [Flash90 photo]

• In co-ordination with Quartet envoy Tony Blair, Israel recently approved a package of measures – the "Blair-Netanyahu Package" – designed to further boost economic development in the West Bank, including building schools and medical clinics and expanding the Palestinian security presence in seven cities.

• Tourism has sharply increased. During the last Christmas holiday, Israel enabled entry to Bethlehem to more than 100,000 Christian pilgrims, a record.

Meanwhile, during the past three years, terrorism and violence emanating from the West Bank has decreased significantly, due to Israel's security fence, Israeli military operations targeting terrorist infrastructure and improved co-ordination with Palestinian security forces.

Several Palestinian companies have thrived in the improved economic climate, including Palestine Telecommunications, which reported first quarter profits of $23.2 million (all figures US), followed by Palestine Development and Investment at $10.9 million, Bank of Palestine at $8.8 million, Palestine Electric Company at $3.8 million, and Al Quds Bank at $1.9 million.

Here are some West Bank economic developments, by the numbers:

• 6.8 per cent: increase in total Palestinian GDP in the West Bank and Gaza in 2009 (8.5 per cent in the West Bank; one per cent growth in Gaza).

• 2.9 per cent: GDP growth recorded in the first quarter of 2010 compared to the fourth quarter of 2009.

• nine per cent: fall in unemployment in the West Bank, from 18.1 per cent in the fourth quarter of 2009 to 16.5 per cent in the first quarter of 2010.

• 22 per cent: increase in construction activity in the West Bank in 2009.

• 12 per cent: increase in the West Bank service sector.

• 12 per cent: increase in industrial production in the West Bank in 2009.

• 12.5 per cent: rise of the Palestinian stock market in 2009.

• 17 per cent: increase in total Palestinian trade in 2008 over 2007.

• 150: roadblocks in the West Bank removed during 2008 and 2009.

• 27: checkpoints removed during the same two years.

Israeli house prices approach bubble territory

Dafna Maor
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Are Israeli housing prices in the bubble range? According to a report by Global Property Guide, housing prices rose at the third-fastest rate in the world in 2010, with an inflation-adjusted 13.4 per cent increase.

The country with the fastest-rising prices was Latvia, with a 19.1 per cent increase. It was followed by Singapore at 13.6 per cent, and then Israel. In comparison, U.S. home prices dropped 5.3 per cent, while those in Ireland plunged 11.6 per cent last year. Furthermore, the pace of the U.S. housing market's decline is picking up – prices fell more in 2010 than in 2009.

"The housing market recovery has stalled" in certain parts of the world, according to the report. Housing prices fell in real terms in 21 of the countries surveyed by Global Property Guide, and rose in only 15.

Eastern European housing markets are still declining, although less than the previous year. A number of Asian nations are still seeing moderate housing recoveries, the report said.

"Despite tighter lending policies and repeated warnings from the central bank, housing prices continue to rise in Israel at double-digit rates. Although the rate of increase has somewhat eased, the monetary authorities are clearly worried," wrote Global Property Guide about the local market.

Museum full of stories about Jewish prairie life

Irena Karshenbaum
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Every person has an idea of what constitutes an adventure. Some would consider a trek through Tibet as being pretty exciting. Others a shopping trip to Milan. Personally, visiting the archives of a museum is my idea of fun. Having loved museums all my life, I was thrilled when I was recently invited to see Calgary's Glenbow Museum's Jewish cultural collection.

Lorain Lounsberry, senior curator of cultural history at Glenbow, was my tour guide. Walking through the massive warehouse, I soon realized how much work Lounsberry had to do to prepare for my visit. It was no simple matter of walking into the archives and just finding stuff there. The location of the objects had to be researched in advance given the size of the collection.

Among its many collections, Calgary's largest museum houses a cultural history collection of about 100,000 objects that tell the story of how we live our daily lives. The collection covers many ethnic and religious groups including about 200 items from the Jewish community of southern Alberta.

Items are archived according to how they were used. We start under the category of "faith" and look at Israel Ziselman's tallit. There are tfillin, kippot, and pharmacist Gerry Nep's B'nai Brith cap.

The most amusing item belonged to Boris Rochman, who after having served in a hard labour camp in Siberia, managed to come to Calgary in 1957. Eventually, he bought Harry's News & Tobacco Shop and successfully invested in other real estate ventures. He donated his tie clip to the museum with the following letters: YCDBSOYA. What does it mean, I ask? We laugh at the answer: You Can't Do Business Sitting On Your Ass.

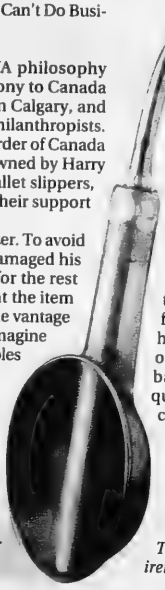
So true.

Other practitioners of the YCDBSOYA philosophy were the Cohen Brothers who brought Sony to Canada after World War II. Harry Cohen settled in Calgary, and he and his wife, Martha, became major philanthropists. They were the first couple to receive the Order of Canada together. The archives hold a few items owned by Harry and Martha Cohen, including bronzed ballet slippers, which they received in 1987 in honour of their support of Alberta Ballet.

The oddest item belonged to Jacob Switzer. To avoid military service in the Russian army, he damaged his own hearing and had to use an ear horn for the rest of his life. It is believed that Switzer bought the item in Warsaw sometime around 1916. From the vantage point of a 21st-century mind, it's hard to imagine sticking something into your ear that resembles a trumpet.

Since I love clothes and accessories, my favourite items are handbags once owned by Marcia Goldberg, who was a driving force behind Calgary Hadassah and the National Council of Jewish Women for almost four decades starting in the 1920s. A few of her luxurious pieces have been left with the museum. I can almost see Mrs. Goldberg stepping into her car in her lace-up boots, purse in hand, dress shimmering, wearing a fur coat and driving to the Palace Theatre to hear violinist Jascha Heifetz perform.

Tie clip owned by Boris (Berek) Rochman, Collection of Glenbow Museum



Ear trumpet used by Jacob Switzer, Collection of Glenbow Museum

There are connections to the Jewish Prairie farming experience, something that's close to my heart. The museum holds the original, and now very fragile, parochet (the curtain that covered the Ark)from the Beth Jacob Synagogue in the Sonnenfeld Colony in Saskatchewan. Ladies of Rimon Calgary, a Jewish needlework guild, used this original parochet to create a replica that is now used in the Little Synagogue at Calgary's Heritage Park. The parochet was once owned by Sam Frohlich of Edmonton, who also donated the Torah Ark from the Sonnenfeld Colony to the Little Synagogue on the Prairie Project.

Lounsberry explained that the museum is open to collecting more items, but it accepts only about five per cent of artefacts that are offered. "The item has to fit into the collecting plan to guide the growth of the collection, to keep it focused, and it must be based on human history. Sometimes people are quite surprised as to what we do collect and don't collect." Lounsberry added that the key to acquisition is, "the story behind the item."

If you have an object that you would like to have considered for Calgary's Glenbow Museum's cultural history collection, please contact Lorain Lounsberry at 403-268-4152.

Sheen demands apology from ADL

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Actor Charlie Sheen is demanding an apology from the Anti-Defamation League for saying that his rant against the executive producer of his hit TV sitcom was "borderline antisemitism."

A letter from Sheen's attorney Marty Singer demands a retraction because, it says, Sheen's only intention was to "address the man rather than his television persona," the TMZ website reported last week.

Sheen, in a radio interview Feb. 24 and in a letter posted on the TMZ website, called the Two and a Half Men executive producer Chuck Lorre a "contaminated little maggot," said he was a "clown" and "stupid," and referred to him several times as Chaim Levine.

Lorre's given name is Charles Michael Levine.

"By invoking television producer Chuck Lorre's Jewish name in the context of an angry tirade against him, Charlie Sheen left the impression that another reason for his dislike of Mr. Lorre is his Jewishness," Abraham Foxman, ADL's national director, said in a statement. "This fact has no relevance to Mr. Sheen's complaint or disagreement, and his words are at best bizarre, and at worst, borderline antisemitism."

Singer's letter points out that Lorre referred to himself by the name Chaim on a vanity card in February, in which he also reportedly writes about "a lifetime of distancing himself from Judaism." The letter also says the ADL should denounce Lorre for acknowledging his "disdain for the Jewish religion."

Sheen went on the defensive, denying his statements were antisemitic. He said in his letter to TMZ that he was "referring to Chuck by his real name because I wanted to address the man, not the bullshit TV persona."

"So you're telling me, anytime someone calls me Carlos Estevez, I can claim they are anti-Latino?" Sheen continued, referring to his given name. On Feb. 25, following reports of substance abuse by Sheen, CBS canceled filming of the final four episodes of the popular sitcom's season and may cancel the show altogether.

Pete Seeger clarifies position on Israel boycott

JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — Folk music icon Pete Seeger, quoted last week as saying that he supports a boycott of Israel, told JTA that his position on Israel is constantly evolving.

Earlier in the week, the pro-boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement group Adalah-NY reported that Seeger met recently with representatives from the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions and told them that he "supports" the anti-Israel BDS movement.

Seeger told JTA that he "probably said" that, but added that he's still learning a lot about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and his "opinions waver with each piece of information" he receives.

The 92-year-old musician also said that contrary to the Adalah-NY report, he doesn't regret taking part in last November's online peace rally "With Earth and Each Other," which was mounted in support of the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies in southern Israel.

The Arava Institute, which brings together an international student body to explore solutions to cross-border ecological problems, particularly those affecting Israel and its Arab neighbours, is "very important," Seeger said.

He added that similar initiatives aimed at reducing tensions between neighbours "should exist all over the world."

One month before the online event, Seeger told JTA that he was resisting calls from the BDS movement to call off his participation. He cited the need for dialogue to bring an end to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"I understand why someone would want to boycott a place financially, but I don't understand why you would boycott dialogue," Seeger said at the time. "The world will not be here in 50 years unless we learn how to communicate with each other non-violently."

Young detectives solve problems in Purimville

Mordechai Ben-Dat
Editor

Adults have Benny Cooperman and Hercule Poirot. Young adults have Nancy Drew and the Hardy Boys. Now younger readers have Jacob and Sarah, two fearless, young detectives who follow their hearts and their desire to do good for others, to fight danger and to solve impossible mysteries.

Toronto author Karen Fisman has brought back the two intrepid heroes of Adventure in Latkaland to deal with the puzzling and potentially disastrous Problems in Purimville (JoRa Books).

Someone or someones with mischief in their hearts are befuddling the important preparations for Purim. Costumes that children delight in wearing on the holiday have been mixed up and muddled: ballet tutus instead of pirates' hats! And the sweet, yummy hamantashen that children depend upon for snacking have been sabotaged: brussel sprouts instead of jam!

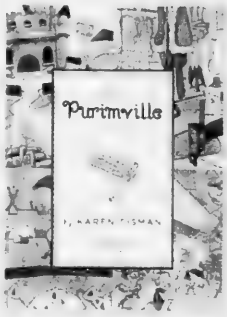
Purim without the appropriate costumes.

Purim without the delicious hamantashen.

How could it happen?

The celebration of the holiday for every child around the world is threatened. Purim must be saved.

Thus, Jacob and Sarah embark on their second adventure. Setting aside their fears and, of course, finding the magic means by which to travel to Purimville – where all Purim costumes and hamantashen are made – they are determined to solve the mystery of who is so mean, so uncaring, to want to spoil the fun of the festival.



Fisman tells a story with sparkling imagination. The make-believe is as smooth as fresh ice on a frozen pond. Together with brightly coloured illustrations by Wendy Faust, she creates a fanciful tale that entertains with child-appropriate episodes of danger and drama even as it teaches values of goodness, persistence and courage.

Jacob and Sarah take us on a new, playful journey from Latkaland to Purimville. And the ride is fun and good reading for all of Purim's children.

Dior designer denies antisemitism

JTA

PARIS — Fashion designer John Galliano denied accusations of antisemitism and racism that cost him his job, but he also apologized for his behaviour and "personal failure."

"I must take responsibility for the circumstances in which I find myself," Galliano said in a public statement last week, adding that he's "seeking help."

On March 1, the Dior fashion house announced that it was firing its star creator after a video surfaced this week showing Galliano praising Hitler, and a second complaint of antisemitism was filed against him regarding events that took place last October.

"I have fought my entire life against prejudice, intolerance and discrimination, having been subjected to it myself," said his statement, which was released by his attorney. "In all my work my inspiration has been to unite people of every race, creed, religion and sexuality by celebrating their cultural and ethnic diversity through fashion. That remains my guiding light.

"Antisemitism and racism have no part in our society. I unreservedly apologize for my behaviour in causing any offence."

Galliano was taken into police custody Feb. 24 after an altercation with two customers at a Paris bar, who claim the designer harassed them with slurs, including "dirty Jewish face, you should be dead" to Geraldine Bloch, 35, according to reports.

"I completely deny the claims made against me and have fully cooperated with the police investigation," Galliano wrote in his statement. He has taken legal action against his accusers for defamation.

The designer claimed he was the victim of prejudice, not the instigator of it. He said he was verbally and physically assaulted over his "look" and clothing.

Paris prosecutors announced that Galliano would be tried in court for "public injury toward individuals due to their origin, their religious affiliation," according to a statement. Galliano could face up to six months in prison and a $31,000 fine for hate and antisemitic speech.

After the video of Galliano praising Hitler appeared online, actress Natalie Portman, who is the face of Dior perfume and is Jewish, said she would not be associated with Galliano.

"I am deeply shocked and disgusted by the video of John Galliano's comments that surfaced today," she said. "In light of this video, and as an individual who is proud to be Jewish, I will not be associated with Mr. Galliano in any way."

A humorous guide to 'educating' your man

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

By the end of her book, Rebecca Eckler will have saved you $4,400 and approximately 17 hours in therapist time and money.

That's because in her new book, How to Raise a Boyfriend (Random House), Eckler, a journalist and author, includes advice and insights from her psychologist "Freud" on why men are the way they are.

How to Raise a Boyfriend suggests treating the man in your life much like you would a child, in order to teach them respect, communication and manners, and grading them on their success.

Indeed, the inspiration for the book came from her seven-year-old daughter, a boy her daughter went to school with and Eckler's boyfriend at the time.

"I was dating a guy who was in his 40s and also I was raising a child by myself. I was exhausted all the time, and I kept looking at my daughter and looking at my boyfriend – she was so much more polite and courteous and she was so generous and thoughtful and sensitive – everything I wanted him to be."

Eckler's encounter with the boy from her daughter's school, who was six at the time, came when they were in an elevator together and he insisted she get off the elevator first. She wondered why a six-year-old child had such good manners, but her 40-something boyfriend did not.

The book, coming in at 184 pages, is an easy read. The chapters are short, well written and quite funny. In addition to Freud, it features appearances from Eckler's esthetician, Helena, some of her ex-boyfriends and the grade-A husband, who Eckler says is actually three men.

The appearances from her ex-boyfriends are one of Eckler's favourite parts of the book.

"They just wanted to rant, because they think us women are crazy. They had so much fun getting it off their chests," she said

Many of my friends (myself included) have at one time or another expressed the desire to change or tweak something about their partner and so the concept of the book rang true. The tips at the end of each chapter are generally good, offering ideas for how to fix a particular offending behaviour without being annoying about it.

A lot of the stories the women Eckler interviewed told about their men make the men look really bad (like the husband who was planning to travel with his wife on her business trip, saw the line at the airport, changed his mind and went home). However, many of the complaints the women in the book have make them look petty and needy.

For instance, one woman complains that her husband never puts his dishes in the dishwasher. Maybe I'm just incredibly easygoing (not really), but to me that is not a big deal in the slightest.

Eckler agrees with me on that count.

"Every woman has their different things. I personally don't care if you leave your dish out. To me that's not a big deal," she said.

Rebecca Eckler

"I learned so much about myself and how I needed to change. I say [the book] is for clueless men, but it's also for clueless women," she continued, adding that she's "less of a naggy bitch" after writing the book.

The one place the book loses me is with Eckler's list of stereotypical and old-fashioned "pink" and "blue" jobs. The "pink" jobs, supposedly the ones women do, include doing laundry, cleaning the fridge and making sure the house is stocked. The "blue" jobs, for men, include carrying the groceries inside, cleaning snow off cars and taking out the garbage.

Now, my mother has been with her boyfriend for 10 years, and they started living together a little more than a year ago. In that household, she does both the blue and the pink jobs – sometimes with me there helping her out. Maybe in some relationships the pink and blue jobs are actually pink and blue jobs, but it isn't always so cut and dry.

Overall, How to Raise a Boyfriend is a book that I think a lot of women will find easy to relate to and funny. And for the men out there, it's an interesting way to get a glimpse into the female psyche – one they'll probably never get from their girlfriends or wives.

Maple Leaf Mike Brown plays with 'testosterone'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Mike Brown was one of the those players for whom the NHL trade deadline was just another date on the calendar. After signing a three-year $2.2 million (US) contract extension with Toronto about a month ago, it was clear he figured in the Leafs' plans for the future.

Brown, 25, is pretty happy with the deal. The Leafs, he said after a practice at the team's Etobicoke training facility, are on the way up. It's got great management and coaching, and the city is a great place to play in, the Chicago native said.

For its part, management reciprocates the sentiment. "We are extremely pleased to have Mike under contract for the next three years," said Maple Leafs general manager Brian Burke, on signing Brown to the extension. "His blend of character, energy and toughness has proven to be a good fit in the overall structure and makeup of our team."

Burke, it seems, has always had a fond spot for Brown. He's the kind of player the Leafs' head man has said Toronto needs – tough guys who play with the "proper levels of pugnacity, testosterone, truculence and belligerence."

Brown and Burke go back a long way – at least in hockey terms. Shortly after Burke left the Vancouver Canucks, his lieutenant, Dave Nonis, selected Brown from the University of Michigan in the fifth round of the 2004 NHL Entry Draft.

Brown played three seasons for the Canucks' AHL affiliate, the Manitoba Moose, before he was traded to the Anaheim Ducks. Coincidentally, Burke was the manager there when the Ducks acquired him.

After two years in Anaheim, he was traded to the Leafs this past summer for a fifth-round pick in the 2010 draft. Surprise, surprise. Burke was the general manager in Toronto at the time.

Burke has made it clear he wanted the Leafs to get tougher and not get pushed around by opponents.

Brown fits that to a T, and unlike other tough guys, he's not a liability when he gets ice time. He's generally a plus in the plus/minus statistic, and he provides the rough, sandpaper-like quality that Burke loves.

"My whole life I was told to get to the puck, to skate hard and fast, get in on the forecheck." His goal is to get a good hit on the opponent's defencemen "so they look behind them to see if I'm coming," Brown said.

Sometimes, the hits are not so clear cut. He was suspended for three games earlier this season for a blind-side hit on Phoenix Coyotes defender Ed Jovanovski. And, no stranger to the penalty box, Brown has had plenty of five-minute fighting majors. There's no shortage of Mike Brown fighting videos on YouTube, including heavyweight tussles with Darren McCarty and Milan Lucic.

It's just a matter of "standing up for the team," Brown explained.

Right now, Brown and the rest of the Leafs are fighting for a playoff spot. Only three points out of eighth place last week, the rest of the season promises to be a tight race that goes down to the wire. It's a time of year Brown relishes. "Everyone's playing with a lot of passion right now. The only way to get into the playoffs is to push it and lay it on the line."

As for his own contribution, in 31 games this season – he's missed a bunch due to injury – Brown has two goals and four assists, but he was plus three.

With his trademark mustache, high energy game, and willingness to drop the gloves, he's become a fan favourite.

Mike Brown

A native of Chicago, Brown's formative hockey years were spent with the U.S. National Team Development Program. His early years were also spent around motorcycles – perhaps that explains his horseshoe or "biker" moustache. His father, Barry, owns Chicago Harley-Davidson and Mike "grew up around it."

"I build 'em" in the off-season," he said, but he won't ride them anymore – at least not while he's still playing.

"When I'm done playing," that's another matter, he added.

Iran claims Olympic logo spells 'Zion'

JTA

Iran is protesting the logo for the 2012 Olympic Games, saying it spells the word "Zion."

Mohammad Aliabadi, head of Iran's National Olympic Committee, accused the British Olympic organizers of "racism" in a letter to International Olympic Committee President Jacques Rogge, the Iranian ILNA news agency reported.

The emblem, which features jagged shapes representing the numbers 2012, has been criticized in the past for its design, which organizers say is modern and intended to catch the attention of young people.

"The use of the word Zion by the designer of Olympics logo in the emblem of the Olympics Games 2012 is a very revolting act," Aliabadi wrote, warning that if it was not changed it could "affect the participation of several countries, especially like Iran which insists on following principles and values."

The International Olympic Committee has rejected the complaint.

Berlin museum documents Nazis

By Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Nazi Germany's persecution and murder of Jews is documented in a museum in Berlin that was officially inaugurated last May to coincide with the 65th anniversary of the end of World War II.

The Topography of Terror, which complements the city's central Holocaust memorial, is located on the site of the former headquarters of the Gestapo and SS, Adolf Hitler's key instruments of terror and repression during the Third Reich.

The buildings were largely destroyed by Allied bombing raids in 1945. The ruins were demolished shortly afterward.

The museum was developed in several stages.

For many years, the site, which marked the boundary between the U.S. and Soviet occupation zones during the Cold War, lay forlorn, neglected and ignored.

But in 1987, two years before the fall of the infamous Berlin Wall and on Berlin's 750th anniversary, a makeshift, open-air exhibition, consisting of photographs, documents and the remnant of a Nazi prison, was opened to the public.

Protected from the elements by a canopy, it was managed by a foundation whose mandate was to devise plans for a permanent exhibition.

Due to financial problems and planning errors, the project lay dormant.

But several years ago, work began on a single-storey pavilion to house a museum and library. During the inaugural ceremony, then-German president Horst Koehler placed Topography of Terror into its historical context.

"No other place is linked as much with the Nazi crimes as this one," he said. "When we become aware of what the perpetrators did we realize that freedom, human rights, tolerance and democracy are values that should not be taken for granted."

Through permanent and temporary exhibitions, the museum charts the history of the Holocaust in minute detail.

Andreas Nachama, its director, hopes it will teach future generations of Germans about "the true character" of Nazi evil.

This photograph of SS officers on an inspection tour of Oslo can be found in the Topography of Terror Museum in Berlin.

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Israel advocates prove that size doesn't matter

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

Four young adults are eating dinner together. The two women at the table are bored, with one failing to stifle a yawn. She slips off one of her high-heeled shoes and gently caresses the other woman's leg. On the other side of the table, one of the male diners gets friendly with the guy sitting across from him.

This video, and others like it, are part of the Size Doesn't Matter (SDM) campaign created by the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS). The goal of the campaign is to reach out to university students and young adults, most of whom are not Jewish and are not interested in Israel and Middle East politics.

Since being uploaded on YouTube Feb. 9, the Israel: Small Country, Big Pride video, showcasing Israel's progressive attitude toward the LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, queer) community, has received more than 6,000 views.

The campaign began a year ago, in February 2010, with the creation of the Israel: Small Country, Big Paradise video. The video features a scantily clad couple in bed, with the woman calling something "small," while staring at her boyfriend's lap. What she's actually referring to is a map of Israel. This video has received nearly 400,000 views on YouTube.

Paige MacPherson, vice-president external of CFJS, says the reaction to the SDM videos has been "fantastic.

"Since the Israel: Small Country, Big Pride video went live, we have been contacted by students at a number of campuses around the world – including at the London School of Economics — who want to use SDM on their campus."

The reason for the campaign's success, MacPherson adds, is because it was created for students by students.

"It's shown to be the single most effective advocacy tool ever executed on Canadian campuses. The success of the SDM campaign shows that thousands of students want to know about Israel beyond the conflict — about Israel's shared values with Canada, such as women's rights and LGBTQ rights."

Rael Katz is the president of Hillel's Israel Awareness Club at the University of British Columbia. He says the materials provided by SDM have been very useful in attracting UBC's "predominantly apathetic students.

"SDM has helped us reach out and connect with the many students who are not politically interested. They have provided us with large amounts of informational packages, free giveaways for tabling events, eye-catching posters and slogans and online material that is easy to refer students to.

"[The] tabling materials proved very successful in attracting these students to our club's table. Once that original barrier is crossed, a simple fact or two about Israel's nightlife, diversity or any other areas SDM touches upon is all that is needed to provide indifferent students with the correct image of Israel."

Some of the other areas SDM focuses on, both in printed materials and on the website, www.sizedoesntmatter.com, includes Israel's leadership in the medical, communication and technological fields and the country's many environmental initiatives, as well as its diversity and stance on gay rights.

SDM's Small Country, Big Pride video, has been effective in making known Israel's stance on gay rights, MacPherson says.

"So far, [Small Country, Big Pride] has been a success. Canadians are proud of Canada's progressive stance on LGBT rights. Taking into consideration that Israel is one of the leading countries in the world when it comes to LGBTQ rights, it is natural that the Size Doesn't Matter campaign focuses on letting Canadians know about this important shared value.

"We recently ran focus groups on the... video, and the feedback was very positive. Our data and focus groups show that this video is an effective advocacy tool."

The campaign's focus on LGBTQ rights made it easy to form a relationship with Pride UBC, a resource group for LGBT students, staff and faculty, Katz says.

"After the launch of SDM, we formed a close relationship with Pride UBC and hosted a joint event last year. Pride UBC has a strict, non-political mandate, and SDM made it easier to present Israel outside of its politics. Although the event itself was not in conjunction with SDM, the materials helped."

The focus on Israel from a non-political standpoint has attracted attention from a large number of campuses across the country, says MacPherson.

"The Size Doesn't Matter campaign has been extremely successful in reaching out to the... students who are not interested in Middle Eastern politics. Many non-Jews are included in this group of newly interested students who want to know about Israel beyond the conflict.

"Students enjoy using Size Doesn't Matter as an advocacy tool and the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students is excited to offer that."

אז אני צפונית

נינה שנהב
nina.shenhav@gmail.com

1 lg onion, diced
2 cloves garlic, diced, sautéed
1 lg carrot, shredded
2 lb. ground meat
2 eggs
3/4 c bulgur, uncooked
1/2 tsp pepper
1 tbl mustard
3 tbl. ketchup

Saute onion & garlic in olive oil 5 min. Add shredded carrots; saute another five min. on medium. Turn off heat. In bowl, combine remaining ingredients by hand, add in sautéed mixture.

SAUCE:
2 lg cans tomato sauce
1 1/3 tbl salt
1 1/2 tsp pepper
2 tbl lemon juice
1/2 c brown sugar
1 tbl white vinegar

Split squashes in half; scoop out seed and create a hollow by scooping out some squash. Fill with meat mixture: Pour sauce over squashes; cover and bake 1 hr at 350 °F until squash is tender.

My friends, the garbage

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

My initial column about the Toronto Police Service was written last November. In it, I wrote about the fear the Toronto Jewish community used to have about criticizing our city and its politicians and police force. I discussed our growth and how we're now much better positioned to challenge activities around us, including the actions of our city's police.

I wrote: "To this day I struggle with the impact a written piece criticizing Toronto would have on the Jewish people. I lug that baggage around, that trepidation. I ask, 'Will we be unprotected by the police should antisemitism slide its serrated blade out of its scabbard of hatred?' This hesitation and fear weighs heavily upon me, particularly because I have listened to horrendous testimonials of abuse men and women have suffered at the hands of local police officers."

I thought through, very carefully, my columns about the police, knowing the difficulty of presenting crucial and sensitive facts to our community in an environment that often discourages open dialogue, discussion and controversy. Our community is generally uncritical in thinking about itself, and we still worry about sticking out. A challenging piece about the cops makes us nervous.

Following my column last month titled, "The police: a need for change," a CJN letter writer stated that the police force deals with "much of society's garbage." Nice. I've spent a lot of time with that "garbage" – the homeless, impoverished and humiliated – and they tell me you've got to be very careful not to run afoul of the wrong police officer.

I know not every cop is bad. That's why the column focused on well-documented examples of police using excessive force and wrongly shooting people. It's that kind of behaviour that encourages mistrust. I wasn't "creating mistrust," as the letter writer said. It's already there.

Case in point: a Feb. 22 Toronto Star article, "Police ignore SIU probe," detailing examples of police inappropriately tackling, punching and breaking the bones of civilians. It quotes the Special Investigation Unit's (SIU) director as saying that police frequently don't respond to his letters detailing such breaches of the Police Services Act.

How as a community could we not be concerned about this?

There are proponents of the police who say that last summer's G20 Summit was just a bad day at the office, when the force was overworked and facing less-than-ideal conditions. Yet they fail to mention that these conditions were often created by police themselves – for example, an incident near the end of the summit in which 1,000 people were arrested, including pedestrians, journalists, shoppers and citizens exercising their legitimate right to protest.

The G20 was something the force was neither prepared nor trained for, and it lacked proper leadership. Premier Dalton McGuinty has yet to apologize for holding a secret provincial cabinet meeting extending police powers for the summit.

As Jews, we should be deeply disturbed by the actions of both our police force and government surrounding the summit. It should chill our sense of safety and security that many people were strip-searched and locked up, often without food and water, and sometimes for simply being present.

This is Toronto. To be a citizen of this city – voted by the Economist Intelligence Unit as the fourth-best city in the world to live in – means we must demand accountability from our police, and that they do a better job.

Then maybe one day we'll be No. 1.

Chai Lifeline
Fighting Illness With Love

Since its establishment five years ago, Chai Lifeline Canada has touched the lives of hundreds of families with support and programs that help alleviate the fear and isolation of pediatric illness and provide compassion and fortitude that allows families to face each day with renewed hope.

Throughout the year, Canadian families benefit from two-dozen programs and services that include ChaiLine telephone support groups, tutoring, Big Brother/Big Sister programs, family days, retreats and respite, case management, education and advocacy.

Last summer, 400 seriously ill children experienced a summer filled with laughter, love, and sunshine at Camp Simcha or Camp Simcha Special, Chai Lifeline's pioneering overnight camps designed to meet the medical and social needs of seriously ill children. They returned home filled with happy memories, determined to fight the pain of illness for another year.

Every Chai Lifeline Canada program is offered at no charge to families. We rely on you, our friends and supporters, to ensure that our programs and services continue to reach every Canadian family who needs us.

Israelis mourn atrocity

Thousands of Israelis attended the funerals for five members of the Fogel family on Sunday. Rabbi Udi Fogel, 37, his wife, Ruth Fogel 36, and three of their children, Yoav, 11, Elad, 4, and Hadas, three months, were stabbed to death in their home in Itamar as they slept last Friday night. Israeli security forces were searching for the Fogels' murderers, believed to be two Palestinians. Please see related stories on pages 4 and 42.

A modern-day Purim

Editorial

At the heart of the story of Purim, the holiday we celebrate in just two days, is a lie. Wicked, mendacious Haman, the prototypical hater of Jews, exploits the vanity of Achashverosh, the prototypical self-absorbed ruler by peddling the narcissist a gross untruth. "There is a certain people," the unctuous Haman begins, "that is different than all the other peoples you rule across your vast empire. They are dispersed throughout your kingdom. They have different laws than everyone else. And, they are disloyal to you. They do not obey your laws" (freely translated from the Megillah).

At the heart of this week's Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) is also a lie. Last weekend, Canada's most celebrated political commentator, Rex Murphy, perfectly pinned that lie in its full perversity to the wall.

"IAW – as, alas, most know – is the annual festival of scorn and propaganda against the world's only Jewish state, a yearly attempt to depict Israel as being in the same moral sewer as South Africa in the days of apartheid.

"IAW tries to do much with big words like apartheid and genocide and racism, where they really do not apply at all. Israel is not perpetrating a genocide against the Palestinians. Nor is Israel a racist state."

June Diab Ruling

OTTAWA — A former University of Ottawa sociology professor will find out in June if he'll be extradited to France to face murder charges in a 1980 Paris shul bombing that killed four people. Hassan Diab, 57, says he's the victim of mistaken identity and denies all charges. His extradition hearing ended last week, and Judge Robert Maranger said he'd deliver a ruling June 8. He said the case hinges on controversial expert French handwriting analysis allegedly tying Diab to the crime.

Sentencing Delayed

CALGARY — A neo-Nazi teen who spray-painted antisemitic graffiti on two shuls and other Jewish sites in Calgary in September 2009 will be sentenced June 16, after meeting face to face with a Holocaust survivor. The youth, who was 17 at the time of the attacks, pleaded guilty last July to wilfully promoting hatred and mischief causing damage to a house of worship. It was Calgary's first hate-crime conviction. A sentencing hearing was adjourned March 4 because the Calgary Jewish Community Council wanted a particular survivor to be part of the legally mandated process, but the person was out of the country, the Calgary Sun reported.

New Security Funds

CALGARY — A Jewish school and a shul in Calgary are among three Alberta institutions to share $38,000 in federal funding for security infrastructure enhancements. Minister of State for Foreign Affairs Diane Ablonczy announced the funds for Akiva Academy and Chabad Alberta earlier this month. A Chabad synagogue was among a number of Calgary Jewish sites hit in a September 2009 graffiti attack.

WORLD

Ketubah For Kate

TEL AVIV — A British artist has prepared a ketubah for Britain's Prince William and his fiancée, Kate Middleton. Michael Horton, who has Israeli citizenship, designed the ketubah for the couple's April 29 wedding, the Associated Press reported. The language, in Hebrew and English, has been altered to be egalitarian and non-religious. Neither the prince nor Middleton are Jewish. Horton delivered the gift to the British ambassador to Israel in a ceremony March 17 in Ramat Gan.

Shabbat Opening

NEW YORK — A Jewish community centre in New York State has decided to open its fitness centre and gym on Friday evenings and Saturdays. The 36-member board of the Rockland JCC in West Nyack voted overwhelmingly to remain open on Shabbat.The new hours will begin April 1. The vote was announced in an e-mail sent to members this month. "The board sought to balance the expectations and needs of a very diverse Jewish community with our need to run a financially viable and accessible organization that would be around for many years to come," the e-mail said. No cash transactions or sales will take place during Shabbat, and Jewish staffers won't be forced to work on Shabbat. In recent years, several North American JCCs, including in Montreal, have decided to open on Shabbat.

Irish Cabinet Swears In Lone Jewish MP

DUBLIN —Ireland's only Jewish member of parliament was appointed to the country's cabinet as the new government was sworn in.

Alan Shatter was sworn in March 9 as justice minister in a coalition of his centre-right Fine Gael party and the liberal Labour party. He represents Dublin South, where most of Ireland's Jews live. The appointment is the culmination of 30 years in national politics, during which he made a name for himself as a reformer of Ireland's conservative family laws.

Shatter, 60, is also well-known as a staunch supporter of Israel. While serving on the committee for foreign affairs during the month-long Gaza war in 2008-09, he had highly charged confrontations with anti-Zionist historian Ilan Pappe and anti-Israel Sinn Fein representative Aengus O Snodaigh.

Shatter is the second Jewish cabinet minister in Ireland's history. Mervyn Taylor served in the 1990s.

Queen's rector slams Ignatieff's anti-IAW views

'Unethical support for Israel' criticized

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Queen's University student government voted last week to hold a referendum to impeach Queen's rector Nick Day for his response to Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff's statement that condemned Israeli Apartheid Week.

Ignatieff's March 7 statement that denounced IAW, an annual series of anti-Israel events held on campuses around the world, is what prompted Day to write an open letter that admonished Ignatieff for his "unethical support for Israel" and for his statements that "betray a deep lack of intellectual integrity."

Ignatieff said that IAW "is a dangerous cocktail of ignorance and intolerance, both of which stand in the way of peace."

Day, who was censured by the university's student government last year for speaking out against Israel during a Remembrance Day speech, demanded that Ignatieff issue an apology or a retraction of his statement.

In his letter, Day wrote that he has attended several IAW events, and he has "never heard an antisemitic word, a single act or speech of hatred, nor anything even approximating an incitement to 'target Jewish and Israeli students for abuse on our campuses.' What I have heard are systematic, rational, and well-researched analyses of what is going on in the Occupied Territories and Israel."

He then accused Ignatieff of employing "cheap tricks of poor logic and manipulative rhetoric... to mobilize frenzy, stifle debate and insulate Israel, an internationally recognized violator of human rights, from criticism."

Taking his position a step further, Day said that if he continues to condemn the critique of the "genocide happening in Palestine, you and the party you lead are complicit in that genocide."

Day, who signed the letter as the rector of the university, and said that he "represent[s] the approximately 20,000 students of Queen's University," hit a nerve with many students who were offended by his letter.

In a letter addressed to Day, Queen's student Kerry Mendelsohn acknowledged his right to make his opinion known, but berated him for claiming to speak for her.

Testing humanity

The sinews of our humanity were stretched last weekend to the full flex of compassion, tears and resolve.

The stunning images from Japan of the massive earthquake, the tsunami, volcanic eruptions and the threats of possible meltdown of nuclear reactors were as humbling as they were horrific. The chain of devastation unleashed by nature upon the people of Japan sent chills down our spine.

How does one defend against the relentless deadly lashing from walls of water more than 30 feet high?

Where does one look for the members of one's family swept suddenly into a sea that surrounds what once was home and hearth?

One cannot defend, one does not find, but one must always rebuild. Such is the imperative of life: to go forward. Never to give up.

Jewish communities around the world and the government of Israel are joining with the Japanese to help in rescuing anyone who may have survived the various disasters and in rebuilding that which was destroyed.

For example, Jewish Federations of North America, including of course those in Canada, are sending aid.

ZAKA, the Israel-based organization that locates and identifies victims of disaster, has offered its service to the government of Japan.

In addition, IsraAid, an Israel-based co-ordinating organization for 17 Israeli and Jewish humanitarian groups, has two teams of rescue personnel, emergency medical officers and water pollution specialists ready to deploy to Japan.

Most human beings try to help alleviate the suffering of fellow human beings. The gruesome images, however, from the community of Itamar in the northern West Bank of the slaughter of five members of the Fogel family were simply horrific. The ghoulish murder – while they slept in their beds on Shabbat – of Udi Fogel, 37, Ruth, 36, Yoav, 11, Elad, 4, and Hadas, three months, sent screams of anguish and disbelief piercing into our hearts.

What manner of individual is so twisted and misshapen by hatred that he plunges his knife into an infant, a child, a youngster?

What manner of national cause does not abjectly reject and cast out from among its champions those who embrace and pass off evil as a legitimate expression of "resistance to the Israeli occupation?"

From the editor's desk...

Against such malevolence Israel must – and always will – defend its citizens. Israel will always rebuild. It has no choice. Israel will never give up. It has no choice. Its enemies will one day understand this.

The inconsolability of these enormous sadnesses overshadowed somewhat the preparations earlier this week for the holiday of Purim. It was very difficult to focus on joyful matters as we are instructed to do at this time of the year by our sages.

But we find room in our hearts for both: the unique celebration of the holiday and the overwhelming sorrow of the Japanese and of the Fogels.

That is not to say that comically surreal events were not also reported by news channels last week.

Perhaps the most head scratching was the story reported by JTA that Syria is seeking to replace Libya on the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC). Libya was suspended from the 47-nation body on March 1, the first time a country has been suspended since the council was founded in 2006.

Syrian President Bashar Assad said his country would seek membership on the council in the May 20 elections.

Assad is as familiar with the notion of protecting human rights as he is with the idea of respecting all religions, which is to say, not at all.

Notwithstanding his lack of credentials, he is, however, as worthy a candidate for the UN Human Rights Council as was Moammar Gadhafi, which is also to say, not at all.

Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, who writes in this issue of The CJN about the woeful lack of accountability of the head of the UNHRC, was quite succinct in his response to Syria's intentions toward the council.

"It's an outrage. The Assad regime runs a notorious police state that denies the Syrian people the right to free speech and freedom of assembly, jails journalists and tortures dissidents. It sponsors some of the world's most vicious terrorist groups and has assassinated numerous journalists and opponents in Lebanon. The UN and the cause of human rights will be severely damaged if Syria's Assad regime wins a seat."

Syria's record on human rights likely assures that it will win a seat on the council. Except for the fact that we are on the verge of Purim, we would normally lament, rather than laugh at such a turn of events.

Despite the absurdity, we press on.

Despite the sadness, we go always forward and get ready, as we must, for the celebration of our holidays.

PM CONDEMNS IAW

Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who spoke last week at the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's fifth annual Action party in Toronto, told about 1,000 young Jewish professionals that his government "has taken a stand" with Israel. He condemned Israeli Apartheid Week, the annual anti-Israel lecture series held on campuses around the world, and said Canadians have an "obligation to speak out and stand up" against the event. Community rallies for Gilad Schalit

Special to The CJN

More than 1,200 people gathered at the Sephardic Kehila Centre March 7 to express solidarity with Gilad Schalit and sympathy for his plight in captivity.

Schalit is the Israeli soldier who was kidnapped by Hamas on June 25, 2006, and has been held captive in Gaza for more than 1,700 days in conditions that were described at the rally as inhumane.

"I promised [Schalit's parents] that Gilad will not be forgotten," Sephardic Kehila Centre president Max Benaim said in reference to a past meeting he had with them. "We stand here united and we shall not rest until Gilad and his family are united," he told the rally, organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Sephardi community of Toronto.

The evening's special guest was Karnit Goldwasser, whose husband, Ehud Goldwasser, and another Israeli soldier, Eldad Regev, were kidnapped by Hezbollah on July 12, 2006, the incident that triggered the Second Lebanon War.

Goldwasser dedicated herself to her husband's and Regev's release. Two years after the kidnappings, their bodies were returned to Israel as part of a prisoner exchange with Hezbollah.

"I believe that the worldwide support I got eventually helped to release my husband," Karnit Goldwasser said.

"Help Gilad come home sooner. Encourage world leaders and make them act for Gilad. Gilad is not only a face and name, he is our values. He hasn't seen the light of day for over 1,716 days. We must make the Red Cross see Gilad. Sending Gilad letters via the Red Cross is something that must be done on a regular basis."

She added that the world must ask Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "to do for Gilad what Ehud Olmert did for Eldad and for my husband."

Liberal MP and international human rights advocate Irwin Cotler also stressed the importance of continuing to apply pressure internationally.

The release of prisoners is "a very great mitzvah. Saving one soul... is like saving the whole world," Cotler said. "Gilad is held in cruel conditions and he is not given the most basic human rights. We must put pressure on the United Nations, the European Union, Russia and whoever we can, so that Gilad's conditions in captivity are improved."

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada, expressed his appreciation on behalf of Israel to the organizers and the people who attended the rally.

The rally also heard similar messages via video.

Among them were Gilad's parents, Aviva and Noam Schalit, who addressed the assembly from their protest tent in Jerusalem.

We dare not ignore the lie

But the fact that the many-tendrilled branches of IAW's activities grow full stem from the trunk of a hideous lie has not deterred IAW advocates from waging their war against the Jewish state. To the contrary. It inspires them.

Similarly, however, precisely because IAW is based upon lies, calumnies and prevarications, many students on campus have rallied to the defence of the Jewish state. And that defence has been inspiring.

With courage and conviction, our children mobilized on behalf of Israel and, it must also be said, on behalf of truth and democratic values.

David Plotkin, a 21-year-old McGill University student told The CJN last week that pro-Israel students have been working hard to defend against the claims being made by IAW's organizers. Ashley Faintuch, a 22-year-old student at the University of Winnipeg, told The CJN, she and her colleagues were determined to counter IAW's arguments by comparing the Jewish state's record on human rights and democracy to those of its neighbouring countries.

Whether they're involved with Hillel, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students, Hasbara, Stand With Us – singly or in small groups, with affiliation to a larger umbrella organization or without – we commend our students. They deserve high praise.

The story of Purim teaches us, among other things, that we dare not ignore the effect of the dissemination of the lie or those who are its propagators. In countering the IAW lies, our students, our children, have stepped into the modern-day story of Purim.

How proud we are of them.

Federal solicitor general Perrin Beatty announced the creation of a special commando-style anti-terror unit of the RCMP, to be modelled closely on similar Israeli, French and British squads. The Special Emergency Response Team (SERT) was to be used when negotiations failed and force was required. It was replaced in 1993 by a unit of the Canadian Forces, the Joint Task Force 2 (JTF 2).

Students fight community's battle

Kudos to Lawrence Hart on his assessment of Israeli Apartheid Week ("IAW: a legacy of inaction," March 3).

It pains me to write this letter – a critique of our Toronto Jewish community and its attitude toward handling Israel on campuses. As someone who has been doing Israel advocacy at York University for some time, I can attest to the feeling of abandonment that resides with the Jewish students on campus who choose to stand up and speak up for Israel. The fundraising, organizing and producing of Israel advocacy programs are done by a small group of students on their own time, on top of their full schedules.

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto must start living up to what it claims to do. "Representing students on campus" does not mean holding cultural events outside of school hours. It entails constant pro-Israel speakers and events on campus, standing at tables in the halls of the university, not just during IAW but rather year-long, and presenting the student public with the true reality of the Mideast. The anti-Israel movement is not going away, and Jewish students are forced to fight this community's battle at the front lines of a much bigger war. Enough inaction, Im tirzu ain zo agada.

Facing down the haters

For too long, Israel has absorbed barrages of the worst propaganda without mounting an effective defence (Students stand up to Israeli Apartheid Week, March 10) . Congratulations to David Plotkin and his colleagues on campus for facing down the haters and publicizing the truth about Israel and those would who drive it into the sea.

Takes pride in our communal leaders

As a Jewish student I take great pride that our communal leaders continue to take on difficult but necessary work on our behalf ("United Church to reassess Mideast policies," March 3). I want to commend Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, for his efforts in trying to present the Israeli story to the United Church of Canada members with whom he recently travelled to Israel. Farber has always been a model to many of us thinking about volunteering or working for Canadian Jewry. Supporting the State of Israel among those who prefer the Palestinian story must be very complicated. Let us hope that his diplomatic skills bear fruit with the Church.

Happy Iranium was screened

I was pleased to read the article "Documentary screened despite Iranian objections" (Feb. 10), regarding the recent showing of the film Iranium at Library and Archives Canada in Ottawa. As a young student studying civics in high school, the issue of the place in society for free thought and expression is especially relevant to me. The Iranian embassy doesn't have the right to decide what films can or cannot be shown here.

Freedom of expression is a fundamental political freedom safeguarded in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and should be defended with all the democratic power at our disposal. How can we expect to make any headway in confronting this contentious issue if at the first sign of trouble we cave in to demands for censorship and suppression? The simple and only answer is that we can't. We should be proud that our government has the intestinal fortitude to stick up for democratic values. After all, as the crisis in the Middle East has repeatedly shown, not many countries can boast that.

Pluralistic outreach needed

Kol hakavod to Martin Lockshin for his keen insight regarding identification with Jewish life and with Israel ("Israel identification among young Jews debated," March 10). Those at the centre of community life tend to forget or disregard the thousands of Jews who are indifferent to or disaffected with Jewish life. Their attitudes toward Israel, negative or neutral, are merely a product of their distance from Jewish concerns. The remedy is not more pro-Israel rhetoric, but more and enhanced pluralistic outreach to marginal Jews offering them both old and new paths to Jewish life.

Purim in Rembrandt's Amsterdam

Karen Fisman
Special to The CJN

On March 7, 1640, on the eve of Purim, the Sephardi Jews of Amsterdam crowded into their Talmud Torah synagogue just off the Breestraat. Some would have been attired in costume and others might have clutched noisemakers. All, however, eagerly awaited the reading of Megillat Esther to be followed by an evening of revelry and merriment.

During the service, the congregation booed with enthusiasm whenever the villain Haman's name was read, just as we do today. Afterwards, the congregants spilled out into the streets of the Vlooienburg quarter, continuing their Purim celebration with such abandon that one of the rabbis, perhaps the wise and worldly Menasseh ben Israel, warned them to dampen their celebrations so as not to upset their Dutch neighbours.

While it is true that some Dutch, most notably the more conservative members of the Dutch Reformed Church, may have been troubled by the Purim revelry, many would have likely been intrigued by the celebrations and, quite possibly, were present as observers. Among the observers could have been the renowned painter, Rembrandt van Rijn, who lived in the Jewish quarter and, as evidenced by the Semitic themes and characters that populated his artwork, was fascinated by his Jewish neighbours and their stories – including the story of Esther.

Scenes from Megillat Esther appear in many of Rembrandt's works – his etchings, drawings and paintings. But while Rembrandt's work may stand out by virtue of his remarkable talent, Esther and the cast of Purim characters make frequent appearances in the art of many other 17th-century Dutch painters. In fact, at no other time or place in Europe did the story of Esther have a greater artistic presence than in the literary and visual arts of the 17th-century Netherlands. Moreover, while earlier paintings of Esther were usually a prefiguration of characters from the Christian Bible, often commissioned to grace the walls and ceilings of churches, Dutch interest in the Purim story came directly from the people themselves.

As the Dutch Reformed Church gave a sweeping interpretation to the commandment prohibiting graven images, the walls of the Reformed churches were quite bare. By contrast, the average Dutchman (or woman) regarded the painted image with delight. Dutch people from all walks of life collected art, and paintings appeared in the salons of the rich, as well as on the walls of the local butcher or bake shop.

Why, one might ask, did the Dutch, artists and patrons alike, take such interest in a minor Bible story – one that was not even definitively accepted as part of the Christian canon until 1546? And why, for that matter, did the Purim holiday provoke such enthusiastic and raucous celebration amongst Amsterdam's refined and genteel Sephardi Jews? As it turns out, the interest of both communities is rooted in a similar theme – a theme of religious liberation.

Around the beginning of the 17th century, Sephardi Jews began to arrive in Amsterdam, either directly or indirectly from Spain and Portugal, where the Inquisition was still in full swing. As Conversos or new Christians, these secret Jews would have been subject to dangerous scrutiny in their countries of origin. Upon arrival in Amsterdam, however, they encountered a far different social climate.

Freedom of religion was enshrined in Dutch society by the Union of Utrecht of 1579, which provided that "every individual should remain free in his religion, and no man should be molested or questioned on the subject of divine worship." While this particular article was drafted before the Jews had arrived in the Dutch provinces (and without consideration of their presence), it reflected a remarkable level of religious tolerance for its time and place.

In Amsterdam, the Conversos found a home where they could reclaim their Jewish identities and prosper financially. This new Jewish community brought valuable business networks to Amsterdam, an advantage that did not go unnoticed by the Dutch authorities who, by 1619, declared the Jews free to worship publicly in the province of Holland.

The Sephardi community initially split into three separate congregations (synagogue politics being timeless!). However, in 1639, differences were set aside and the congregations combined into one. Henceforth, the Sephardi Jews of Amsterdam worshipped together in the Talmud Torah synagogue, just off the Breestraat, in the very neighbourhood where Rembrandt lived. And amongst the congregation's learned rabbinate was Menasseh Ben Israel, an acquaintance and collaborator of Rembrandt, who illustrated Ben Israel's book, Piedra Gloriosa.

The Sephardi Jewish community thrived in an Amsterdam, where different cultures and religious beliefs were, at the least, viewed with a stiff-lipped tolerance, if not with downright acceptance. In 1675, the dedication ceremony of the grand new Sephardi synagogue drew a massive crowd of Jews and non-Jews alike, including many high-ranking city officials. Where else in 17th-century Christian Europe would such a sight have be seen?

It's no wonder therefore that the Purim story was so embraced by the Sephardi Jews of Amsterdam and that they celebrated it with such joyous abandon. The story of Esther's experience as a secret Jew within the palace of King Achashverosh would certainly have resonated with this community, not far removed from their own experiences as Conversos. In addition, these Jews, now able to celebrate their true religious identities, both privately and publicly, without fear of persecution, felt a particular affinity with the Jews of Persia who had overcome the threat of Haman's edict and gained strength and prosperity. Accordingly, as the Jews of Persia celebrated, so did the Sephardi Jews of Amsterdam!

And what of the Dutch Protestants and their interest in the story of Esther? As Calvinists, the Dutch were encouraged to study the Jewish Bible – their Old Testament. Thus, the Purim story would have been known to them as one among many other biblical stories. The celebration of Purim would certainly have been familiar to any Dutch gentiles living in and around the Vlooienburg quarter, the heart of Amsterdam's Jewish community. But as we've already noted, interest in the story stretched well beyond the Vlooienburg quarter.

It has been suggested that perhaps it was the Sephardi Jews that stimulated painterly interest in the story of Esther. They were, after all, a prosperous community and many were avid art collectors. In addition, we know that they had a special attachment to the Purim holiday. However, while there is reason to believe that at least some Purim-themed paintings ended up on the walls of prosperous Sephardi households, there is no specific evidence of these paintings being commissioned by members of the community itself.

Perhaps the most compelling explanation for Dutch interest in the story of Esther is rooted in their own fight for religious freedom. In the 16th century, as Protestantism was spreading rapidly throughout the Spanish Netherlands, powerful Catholic Spain imposed a regime of religious oppression. The Dutch rebelled, and Spain responded by sending the ruthless Duke of Alba with an army of thousands to quash Dutch resistance. Somehow, miraculously, in the early 17th century, the tiny Dutch nation achieved freedom after battles waged that, according to the Dutch retelling, could only have been won by Divine intervention.

The Dutch, knowledgeable of their Old Testament, began to identify themselves as the new Israelites. And with artists such as Rembrandt living amongst the Jewish community, attention was drawn to the story of Esther. It was a compelling parallel. Mordechai and Esther came to symbolize the heroic leaders of the Dutch rebellion, and of course, wicked Haman served as a stand-in for the heartless Duke of Alba.

The holiday of Purim is a marvelous one for many reasons. We enjoy its comedic elements on their own merits and celebrate the victory of the Jews of Persia over wicked Haman. We watch our kids as they thrill to the excitement of attending synagogue dressed in favourite costumes, making plenty of noise during the Purim service, encouraged by parents and rabbi alike, and of course, eating more than a few tasty hamantashen.

But perhaps this year, as we revel in the celebrations, we can also take a moment to appreciate the religious freedom that we in North America take for granted – the religious freedom that drew Jews and Protestants of 17th-century Amsterdam to the story of Esther.

Karen Fisman is a writer based in Toronto. She is the author of An Adventure in Latkaland and Problems in Purimville, a new Purim adventure story for kids.

Hail to the Queen, or to the chattel?

What could be more feminist – or more sexist – than the Book of Esther? Although the action is situated in a historical moment and place that gave women little political power, the text portrays a series of events that would be unimaginable without the activism of women.

It is, at the same time, possible to read the story recounted in the Megillah as one that considers only the action of men as important. The triumvirate of key players – a king, his trusted vizier and a Jewish man – represent some kind of power, whether emerging from political position or from inner conviction. Women soak in scented baths and stand by their men. And, despite the fact the Megillah bears her name, Esther can be read as a passive tool – of Mordechai, of the king, of God. Most often, she does as she's told and struggles against her destiny.

The way we read the Book of Esther is a good example of the ways that communities of readers reinvent their texts, remaining faithful to the traditional language but drawing out meanings that are consonant with contemporary issues and sensibilities. Take, for example, the place of the Megillah in the early development of Jewish feminism, in the late 1970s and early 1980s. A read-through of some of the books and articles published in those years about the status and place of Jewish women reveal that many women looked to Purim as an opportunity to focus on Jewish women's accomplishments.

The account of danger looming and avoided, recounted in the Megillah, provided a rich source text for readers looking to retrieve from traditional sources a view of women that was consonant with modernity. Women looked not only to the obvious heroine, Esther, in retellings and interpretations that ensured the orphan-Queen was not simply cast under the shadow of Mordechai. They construed Esther as a latter-day activist, a mastermind, who understood that the politically powerless can nonetheless influence events in important ways through a combination of strategy, boldness, and (in a good way) manipulation.

More radically, Jewish women writing in the 1970s and 1980s also re-imagined Vashti, Esther's deposed or murdered predecessor, as a feminist hero. In published articles and unpublished, photocopied sheets, Vashti was portrayed as a women who insisted on her own dignity and integrity, facing down a foolish but powerful and abusive husband, even at the cost of her own life.

Even Zeresh, the wife of Haman, portrayed in rabbinic sources as equal in wickedness to her husband, sometimes earned a more sympathetic reading, as a woman without choices in a culture that reduced women to objects and chattel.

Of course, the text in its entirety – beginning with the preposterous idea that male pride necessitates utterly subservient wives – seems to make fun of the intensely patriarchal system in which its events take place. I mean, men on a week-long bender worrying about who really wears the proverbial pants in the family? Concocting a plan to kill a queen so that everyman can be assured of being king in his own castle? Puhleez. And these "wise" men were part of the same cadre of advisors who thought wiping out the kingdom's Jews would be a good idea. So the misogynists are also antisemites.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Does it do it justice or does it bend it out of shape when we read an ancient text with contemporary eyes? The truth is, we can scarcely do otherwise. While scholars may work to retrieve the meaning that a text had for readers in its own time, any text with lasting power speaks to each generation of readers – to each reader – anew. In a living tradition, texts are not only of the past, they are also of the present. We cannot help but bring our own culture's anxieties and priorities to bear on what we read. In that sense, we are always reinventing our texts and traditions.

At the same time, these traditions bring the past inside us, so that we think about our lives today not as orphans in history (to borrow a phrase from Paul Cowan's wonderful memoir), but as people linked to those who came before us and those who will follow. It's a mark of its creative vitality that the Jewish tradition has not only tolerated but encouraged the probing and the reinterpretation of our collective memory.

Non-Orthodox Judaism: a different model

When they say that it's not about money, it is about money. Josh Nathan-Kazis reported in a recent issue of the Forward about big changes within each of the three liberal denominations in American Jewry – Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist. All seem to be under pressure to cut costs.

The Reconstructionists are merging their national organization with their rabbinic school. Though a spokesperson is quoted to have said that "this is not just a cost-cutting measure" but an attempt "to figure out what's the best way to further the movement," no other cogent reason than money comes to mind.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The Conservative movement, which has lost many congregants in recent years, has adopted a strategic plan that'll try to make affiliation cheaper in order to attract independent minyanim and chavurot that may style themselves as Conservative and, therefore, might join if the price is right. There are several such groups in Canada.

Reform has so far been holding its own to become the largest denomination. Nevertheless, it's under financial strain and has recently re-organized, which is a euphemism for firing people.

A group of rabbis of large and wealthy Reform congregations that calls itself Rabbinic Vision Initiative (RVI) has been formed recently. It has been described as a think-tank, but its agenda suggests a pressure group. Since the congregations that these rabbis serve normally pay substantial affiliation dues to the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ), the umbrella organization that includes Canada, and the Hebrew Union College (HUC), which has trained Jewish professionals since the 19th century, it's reasonable to assume that money has something to do with it.

The members of the RVI may want to use the financial clout of their congregations to influence the movement and probably try to pay less. Instead of sharing their resources with poorer sister-congregations, the intention may be to cut a better deal for their own.

When I served a large congregation and members would ask me what benefits they derived from URJ affiliation, I'd invariably reply that even if there were none, the privilege of helping the collective to maintain those who cannot fend for themselves was sufficient. That's what makes a movement. Also, all rabbis currently serving Reform synagogues in Canada are HUC graduates.

Sadly, none of the three organizations say anything about content. None of them has produced interesting ideas in the last few decades. Their current exponents seem to show much greater interest in strategic planning than religious direction. They seek the guidance of social scientists and pollsters, not of scholars and thinkers.

Perhaps that's because there's really very little difference between them. If they could free themselves from labels and institutional affiliations they'd not only save money but, more importantly, help save Jews for Judaism. They should unite to face their common enemy: apathy.

I got a hostile reaction from a rabbi in Toronto when I commented on his and other congregations leaving the Conservative movement to form an organization of their own. We now learn that the dissenters are about to sponsor a rabbinic school that's bound to cause further artificial divisions in the community – and cost money.

The prospect of leaving the Conservative movement seems to have attracted lay leaders of these congregations to the chance of cost-cutting, while the spiritual leaders talked about irreconcilable ideological and halachic differences. Both may have miscalculated. Knowing many members of the congregations in question, I find it difficult to believe that, on average, their lifestyle is radically different from that of members of the Reform congregations I served. And one of their prime movers is an HUC graduate.

In addition to institutional intransigence, the desire to cut costs appears to remain an important factor, but a poverty of ideas may be hiding behind the claims of fiscal responsibility. The time has surely come for the leaders of the three movements to re-think their positions in order to build a joint open tent in which all non-Orthodox Jews can find their place.

Let each congregation determine its religious practices and specific liturgical style while working together under the same umbrella to bring more Jews into the extended family. The existing schools currently training Jewish professionals could be streamlined and merged yet reflect diversity.

The challenge is to be united despite our relatively minor differences and not to stay different despite our massive similarities. And that will save money, too.

Letter from Guatemala

Sheldon Kirshner in Guatemala City

Guatemala, terra incognita to most Canadians, is a Central American nation of sharp contrasts with an unusually violent history. Only 2-1/2 hours away by air from Miami, it is a mixed-race country with a glorious Mayan past whose indigenous population was conquered by Spanish conquistadors nearly 500 years ago in a brutal campaign of subjugation.

Convulsed by two civil wars, the first of which broke out in the 19th century and the second of which stretched from 1960 to 1996, causing the death of 200,000 Guatemalans, Guatemala has long been torn by appalling economic disparities, riven by political instability, rocked by palace coups and ruled or misruled by social reformers or dictators.

Derisively dismissed as a banana republic due to its fawning submission to the United Fruit Company, an American firm that was a major force here in the 20th century, Guatemala was and still remains under the sway of its great northern neighbour, the United States, which orchestrated the removal of a democratically elected government in 1954.

An exporter of coffee, bananas, sugar and fresh vegetables, Guatemala, a land of active volcanoes, is bordered by Mexico to the north, Belize to the east and Honduras and El Salvador to the south.

Physically diverse, Guatemala is composed of vastly distinct regions. The central highlands, containing two of its most important towns, Guatemala City and Antigua, and its deepest lake, Atitlan, enjoys a mild year-round climate. The Pacific coast is hot and humid. The sparsely populated Peten region in the north, famous for its Mayan ruins in Tikal, is clad in pristine rainforests.

Like Canada, Guatemala is multicultural and is home to a mélange of races. The descendants of Mayans and Spaniards, the mestizos, form roughly 40 per cent of its population of 13 million. Amerindians, including K'iche and Mam, make up about one-third of its citizenry. Caucasian Christians of Spanish, German, Italian, British, Arab and Scandinavian descent account for 18 per cent of its residents. Smaller communities consist of Garifunas, descended from Africans and indigenous peoples, and of Asians, mainly Chinese and Koreans.

Approximately 1,000 Jews live in Guatemala, with the vast majority residing in the capital, Guatemala City, the biggest metropolis in Central America.

During the Spanish colonial period, which ended with Guatemala's independence in 1821, Jews disguised as Catholics drifted into Guatemala and were eventually completely assimilated.

Jewish immigrants from what is now Germany began arriving in the mid-19th century. Among them was the Stahl family, which established cotton mills and went into banking. In common with the earliest Jewish settlers, the descendants of the Stahls, distributors of Toyota cars and trucks today, are no longer Jewish.

Still other German Jews earned a livelihood as owners of coffee plantations.

A new wave of immigration, starting about 100 years ago, brought a fresh influx of Jews from Germany, Poland, Russia and the Middle East.

With the rise of Nazism in Germany, Jorge Ubico, the authoritarian president of Guatemala from 1931 to 1944, clamped down on Jewish migration. As a result, the Jewish population fell to about 800 by 1939. During the second civil war, when death squads roamed the country and kidnappings were virtually a daily occurrence, some Jews emigrated, only to return when hostilities finally ceased.

Today's Jewish community is solidly middle and upper middle-class and consists of four distinct sub-communities.

The Centro Hebreo, with headquarters in one of Guatemala City's finest neighbourhoods, the leafy zona 9, is Ashkenazi and Orthodox. Maguen David, with a beautiful synagogue in the city's old and rundown commercial district, zona 2, represents Sephardi Jews. Chabad Lubavitch has a strong presence. Israelis, who are big in security in a city with a high crime rate, round off Guatemala's mainstream Jewish community.

The "elephant in the room" is Casa Hillel-Beit Hamadrij, a unique community consisting solely of Christian converts to Judaism.

Shunned by the Jewish community, Casa Hillel was co-founded in 2005 by Alvaro (Eliyahu) Soto Orantes, a coffee and tea salesman, and Jacques Cukierkorn, a Brazilian-born rabbi affiliated with the New Reform Temple in Kansas City.

Rabbi Cukierkorn, a founder of Kulanu, a non-profit organization that supports isolated and emerging Jewish communities around the world, got involved with Casa Hillel by chance.

Orantes, never having found spiritual sustenance in Christianity, turned to Judaism while still an adolescent.

"I felt a need to be connected," he said, his wife, Jeannette, translating from Spanish.

Now 52, Orantes received no encouragement from the local Jewish community, but after stumbling upon Rabbi Cukierkorn's website, he was off and running. Rabbi Cukierkorn converted and remarried Orantes and his Casa Hillel compatriots. Since then, he has conducted classes in Judaism on the Internet and donated books and a sefer Torah to these new Jews. And he visits Guatemala regularly to administer to their needs.

"These are some of the most sincere and committed people I have ever known," he said.

"Rabbi Cukierkorn has been very helpful," said Jeannette Orantes, a lively and animated woman of 55 who was a pious Catholic until her conversion.

I met her and her husband, as well as three other members of Casa Hillel, one afternoon at my hotel in Guatemala City.

Santiago Castenada, 47, is a dentist. Originally from Colombia, he was drawn to Judaism after finding his surname on a list of Sephardi Jews who settled in South America centuries ago. His wife, Raudith Polo, 39, is a convert as well. Jaime Guiterrez, 54, studied theology and Hebrew in Nicaragua, hoping to become a Protestant pastor. "My studies awakened me to Judaism," said Guiterrez, who converted in 2009 and now teaches Hebrew at a local university.

Casa Hillel, with a membership of 30, has no fixed address, lacking the funds to buy a building. But to hear them talking, they are utterly dedicated to their faith. "We observe all customs and holidays," said Jeannette Orantes, whose three children, ranging in age from 15 to 29, are also converts. "We love Judaism, the Torah and Israel."

Much to their disappointment, Casa Hillel has been ostracized by the organized Jewish community. "There is no contact," said Orantes. "It is a case of racism," she added, referring to the community's attitude. "We are not the enemy. We are more than friends."

My Romspen Investment, My Family, My Future.

I have been a satisfied investor in Romspen mortgages going back to a time where one invested in individual syndications, before the Romspen Mortgage Fund began. Romspen's straightforward approach to investing is in line with my philosophy for solid investments. Slow and steady monthly yields, an open book management style, no PR spins.

I can take care of my future, and with the cost of caring for an aging parent, I have the comfort of knowing that my Romspen investment has helped make my transitions in life a beautiful journey. That in itself is a big thing.

Purim app-ticipation

Purim is almost here, and if you just can't wait, you can carry a Megillah wherever you go, or at least a noisemaker or two – if you've got an iPhone (or iPod touch or iPad).

A lot of app creators seem to want to try their hand at building a better gragger. There's the free (but oh so boring) Ratchet! [http://bit.ly/purimapp1] and Purim (99 cents), which is slightly better. At least you can choose between two styles of graggers. [http://bit.ly/purimapp2]

But why settle for a gragger that someone else has designed when you can add a personal touch? Grogger Factory (99 cents) lets you custom build your virtual gragger by choosing its style (tin lizzy, Israeli, vilde chaya); veneer (wood, marble, goo, snakeskin); sound (whistle, siren, boo, oy gavolt!) and background (synagogue, hamantashen, under the sea, outer space). [http://bit.ly/purimapp3]

When I came across Grogger (free), I thought, "Here's something different – a game that promotes the moderate use of alcohol on Purim." The goal is to make your way safely across town but, as you drink more, navigation becomes harder. Only after poking around the game, I realized that it was created by the city of Melbourne "because we don't want you to get smashed." Presumably, "grogger" is Aussie slang for inebriation. Anyway, the message still applies. [http://bit.ly/purimapp4]

Reminiscent of the venerable Concentration memory game, Purim Matching Game Memory Pairs (99 cents) has you tap on the screen and presents a glimpse of holiday symbols (hamantash, megillah, gragger, etc.) Your goal is remember where each symbol is and match it up to its twin as quickly as possible. [http://bit.ly/purimapp5]

Cooking with the Bible: Esther Saves Her People (99 cents) "lets you recreate a traditional meal from the joyous holiday celebrating Queen Esther's triumph over evil Haman." Nice in theory, but do we really think that the Jews of Persia were dining on chocolate chip challah, sweet and sour bass and vegetable cholent? And if they were, I can't believe they were feasting on creamy artichoke soup and herb-basted turkey breast – at the same meal! [http://bit.ly/purimapp6]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

Here is one site you should definitely bookmark. [http://bit.ly/purimapp9] JewishiPhoneCommunity.org is a wonderful clearinghouse of the latest Jewish apps, and despite its name, you'll find information about apps for Android and Blackberry-based phones, too.

Megilat Esther HD (99 cents) provides the text of Megillat Esther, along with sound effects, and illustrations from Israel's Malchut Waxberger Gallery. [http://bit.ly/purimapp7]

And just like the best Purim goodies that you find on your doorstep, Megillat Esther – The Story of Purim is delightful, and free. As you scroll down the, um, scroll, you are presented with the full Hebrew text of the Megillah. But what makes this really fun are the buttons that deliver sounds, including air horn, machine gun, crowd booing, firecrackers and, of course, the sound of a classic gragger. Just shake for a random noise. [http://bit.ly/purimapp8]

Chag Purim Samayach.

Don't lump Jewish camps with SUVs

Two New York-area Jewish day schools recently circulated letters informing parents that sending their children to Jewish summer programs, including overnight camps and programs in Israel, may jeopardize their eligibility for school subsidies. The schools correctly state that "paying tuition should be a priority" that must take precedence "over discretionary expenses such as home renovations, family vacations, new cars, etc."

I empathize with the plight of the schools. As the economic crisis continues to affect their communities, requests for subsidies are steadily rising while donations needed to meet these requests are dropping. At the same time, the cost of operating schools – salaries for good teachers, overhead for buildings, libraries, student support, technology, etc. – do not abate. Day schools everywhere are carefully re-examining their budgets to maximize the impact of each dollar.

Class Act

Daniel Held

Day school parents make sacrifices. Providing children with the scope, depth and richness of Jewish studies that only a day school can provide is expensive, and for most families it comes at the cost of discretionary expenses such as those described in the letter. These are painful calculations for any family – whether they are paying the full bill or applying for subsidies. In many respects, the cost is most burdensome for families whose earnings are just above the subsidy threshold.

One of the hardest jobs in any day school is sitting on the subsidy committee. These lay and professional leaders evaluate need and make difficult choices in the allocations of the increasingly scarce and increasingly needed scholarship funds. While I recognize their need to set clear and consistent criteria, I believe the scholarship committees at these two schools are making a critical mistake.

The costs of educational Jewish summer experiences cannot be lumped together with the expenses of Mediterranean cruises and new SUVs. Day schools cannot be stand-alone institutions of Jewish education. Rather, the rich Judaic knowledge of Jewish schooling must be complemented by the affective learning that takes place in camps, youth movements and other Jewish experiences.

In fact, the same week the day school subsidy letters were distributed, a new study showing the long-term impact of Jewish summer camp was released. Prof. Steven M. Cohen's systemic, quantitative study demonstrates that camp experiences influence the way Jewish adults practise Judaism and how they connect to the Jewish community and Israel. In a similar vein, my own research has explored the strong impact that Shabbatons and Israel experiences have on strengthening the identity of day school students themselves.

While the scholarship committees' decision may serve the schools' bottom lines, it doesn't fully take into account the educational needs of the students. Jewish education and Jewish living must be seen as a holistic endeavour in which schools and synagogues, camp and youth movements collaborate not only on subsidies but also on calendaring and curriculum, recruiting and resource-sharing.

The bifurcation of formal and informal Jewish education weakens the overall field. Rather than seeing other organizations as competition and fighting for a slice of the pie of educational dollars, we need to grow the overall pie and encourage greater investment in the endeavour of Jewish learning.

IAW – its time has come and gone

On Campus

Justin Dahan

Here we go again! Around the world the bell has rung, and it's time for Round 7. Jewish students are again staring at an opponent they are all too familiar with – Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW).

The seventh annual global IAW this year is March 7 to 20. The traditional week would have been March 7 to 14, but the international IAW committee decided to expand the "week" to March 20. It's the annual period when anti-Israel radicals rally on campuses to accuse a democratic country of being an apartheid state.

Don't let the expanded week fool you – this movement is not picking up steam. Last year, Ontario MPPs, including the NDP, condemned Israeli Apartheid week. Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman introduced the motion, saying IAW is "close to hate speech."

Despite the opposition, IAW has not gone away. It's making its seventh appearance on our campuses, and Mark Klibanov, a fourth-year engineering student at Carleton University and the president of the Israel awareness committee in Ottawa, points out that "the movement has been growing among radical left-wing groups. However, it has been proven to be largely ineffective at fostering dialogue for the Palestinian cause."

Fostering dialogue between the two parties is arguably the most important piece of the puzzle if we want to generate a better understanding of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But IAW is a close-minded event that reeks of a dangerous double standard – supporters of IAW believe that Israel is an apartheid state that does not give equal rights to its non-Jewish citizens, but they won't discuss the issue, and when faced with evidence that demonstrates the contrary, they refuse to acknowledge it.

One of the activities the Israel awareness committee sponsored during IAW was to bring in exciting speakers. One of them was Ishmael Khaldi,who serves in the Israel Foreign Service. Most importantly, he is a Muslim Bedouin and highest-ranking minority in the IFS.

Khaldi is a striking example of the rights that minorities truly have in Israel. He's a Muslim who has flourished there and has also served his country. And what type of welcome has Khaldi received from radical pro-Palestinians? On Feb. 2, he spoke at the University of Edinburgh, where his speech was interrupted by pro-Palestinian protesters. To avoid future conflict, Khaldi left the stage after 45 minutes and was told he would not be welcomed back.

While the action committee brings speakers who portray both sides, the IAW has yet to find a speaker or plan an event that is not strictly geared to its supporters, and this week offers a series of events that only succeed in making Jewish students uncomfortable as their homeland is brazenly attacked without foundation.

As to how long this week will continue to plague our campuses, Mark Klibanov has an idea. He said he can't speak to whether it will end globally, but it should end in the next year or two at Carleton.If he is correct in his assumption, then we can only hope that this doesn't stop at Carleton and IAW continues to be disbanded all across Canada.

Purim teaches us to value God's role

Sephardi Windowl

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

We know the sun rises every morning and sets every evening, and we trust that this will happen again tomorrow, simply because it always has. This is how nature operates. This is one way that God wills His presence to be known. It's how He has established order in the universe, even if we don't always recognize His "hand" behind what we call nature. We just know that in this world, the sun rises and sets, oil burns and children are born. Bearing this in mind, let us look at the story of Purim.

As we all know, during the time of Achashverosh, the king signed an edict that the Jews be killed. Subsequently, Mordechai told Esther that the Jews needed her intervention. Esther had to ask the King to spare the Jewish people.

Esther, being initially hesitant, informed Mordechai that whoever comes to the inner court of the king without being called by him will be put to death. Only those to whom the king holds out the golden scepter are spared this demise. Mordechai responded by telling Esther that she shouldn't think that merely being in the palace would exempt her from the fate of the rest of her people.

At this point, Esther took control, saying Mordechai should gather all the Jews in Shushan so that they should fast for Esther, as would she and her attendants. With this preparation, she would go to the king, despite the risk.

The Ibn Ezra (1089-1164) notes that Esther's own behaviour was puzzling. We know that a person who fasts for three days becomes weak, and, in the case of Esther, would not look as attractive because of her ensuing weakened physical state. Given that King Achashverosh chose Esther to be his queen because of her physical beauty, why would she want to diminish the most valuable asset she possessed, expecting to win him over? Furthermore, why did Esther tell Mordechai that she was going to fast in the first place?

The Talmud says that Esther had a green hue to her skin and was not very attractive. She understood that if she was chosen queen, God Himself was behind it, by giving her a beauty that was appealing to Achashverosh—much as He is behind the natural order of the universe, even if, usually, this is unacknowledged by us. Consequently, she decided to fast, appealing directly to God, not to her illusory physical beauty. She implored Mordechai to make this abundantly clear to the Jewish community.

And so the people understood through Esther's discernment and courage and Mordechai's wise direction who really controls our world. The Jews exhibited faith in this reality through fasting and prayer and were saved from annihilation.

The story of Esther shows how we are to appreciate the role God plays in our lives. Nature is a system by which we regulate our lives only because God makes it so, and it is as wondrous as miracles are divinely supernatural.

Let us understand in our own lives the mundane, "natural" occurrences for the gifts from God they truly are.

Purim's on its way

CHESED FOR LIFE: Robbins Hebrew Academy's (RHA) Beth Tikvah campus, in partnership with United Chesed , has developed links with needy families in the community. Each class has adopted a family. Students then write cards for life events and take part in various drives to provide food and clothing to the families. For Purim, each class contributed non-perishable food items that were gathered and boxed by Grade 8 students. Each family will receive two boxes of food and a gift certificate donated by the RHA Parents' Association for a local grocery store. United Chesed co-ordinators, far left and far right, Shoshana Taitz and Lauren Snipelisky are pictured here with, standing, Dekkel Bachar, Amanda Smoskowitz and Tyra Morton, with Raquel Benitah seated.

ADAR INVASION: The student council at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns branch on Neptune Drive celebrated the month of Adar with its annual "invasion," in which council members dress up and burst into classrooms singing Mee sh'nichnas Adar, Marbim B'Simcha ("When the month of Adar comes, we increase our happiness"). Students were then showered with candy treats.

Kachol Lavan prepares to open third campus

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Kachol Lavan, the supplementary school that began in a Thornhill basement about seven years ago to meet the needs of Israeli immigrants, will open its third Toronto-area campus in Thornhill Woods in September.

At press time, Ariel Zaltzman, the principal, told The CJN that the school was still in discussion with the York Region District School Board to determine the exact location.

Currently, Kachol Lavan has a total of 282 students in rented space – 240 at Leo Baeck Day School's Thornhill location, and 42 at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

The Leo Baeck location is at capacity for its Sunday classes, Zaltzman said.

Although the new campus is not far from the existing northernmost branch, he said that its closer proximity to families living in Thornhill Woods may influence families – particularly Israeli-Russians whose children are not currently receiving formal Jewish education – to consider registering.

With an added location, Zaltzman said, the school should be able to accommodate up to 500 children in total.

The Bialik location, which runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 5, was opened in 2007, then closed after a number of families moved back to Israel. It reopened this year because of a demand in the neighbourhood, and also to reach out to non-Hebrew-speaking families living in that part of the city, Zaltzman said.

In Thornhill, classes run from JK to Grade 8. The school also offers a high school credit course for teenagers.

Kachol Lavan – which focuses on secular, cultural aspects of Jewish education, and incorporates "a lot of art and music" – caters mostly to children from Hebrew-speaking families, with about 60 from non-Hebrew-speaking families and about 70 from the Russian community (mostly via Israel), Zaltzman said.

Recently, Jewish communities in other cities have expressed an interest in starting local Kachol Lavan programs, he added.

READING MONTH AT BIALIK

Grade 4 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School surround author Kitty Wintrob and her husband, Ralf, after a storytelling and book-reading session in which Kitty spoke and Ralf read from her book, I'm Not Going Back: Wartime Memoir of a Child Evacuee. The event was part of Reading Month and the MS Read-a-Thon.

Prime Minister addresses CJPAC party

'New antisemitism a global threat'

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Prime Minister Stephen Harper made a last-minute appearance at the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's (CJPAC) fifth annual Action party for young professionals last week, repeating his oft-stated message that his government stands with Israel.

Israel is here to stay, Harper told more than 1,000 people March 10 at Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music.

"Our government has taken a stand. When Israel is consistently and conspicuously singled out for condemnation, we are morally obligated to stand up against that... We support Israel, not just because it's the right thing to do, but also because history has shown us over and over again that those who threaten the existence of the Jewish people are ultimately a threat to all of us."

Antisemitism is evolving, he added.

"The new antisemitism is a global threat. It targets the Jewish people by targeting Israel, which it depicts as a source of injustice and conflict in the world perversely using a language of human rights to do so," Harper said. "We must be relentless and uncompromising in exposing this new antisemitism for what it is."

Reflecting on current events, he strongly condemned Israeli Apartheid Week, the annual on-campus lecture series designed to delegitimize Israel. "At one time, we could have expected threatening behaviour toward Jewish students to be rejected in any form at institutions of higher learning. Unfortunately, it is now often the behaviour of the anti-Israeli mob that is allowed to prevail."

Saying that "we have the right and thus the obligation to speak out and stand up" Harper urged CJPAC supporters to continue their work. "You are standing for the very values that go to the core of what both Canada and Israel are all about – opposition to violence, to tyranny, to antisemitism, to all the related forms of racism and intolerance. And you are supporting freedom, democracy, justice for our fellow citizens indeed, for all peoples."

Among the many other federal, provincial, and municipal politicians in attendance were federal Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff – who also addressed the crowd with a strongly pro-Israel message – as well as Tory Senator Linda Frum, Ontario Attorney General Chris Bentley, Ontario PC Leader Tim Hudak and Toronto Mayor Rob Ford.

The event was "designed to give our community's young professionals the opportunity to intimately speak with politicians in a comfortable and informal environment," said Jeff Kimel, one of the four Action party co-chairs, along with Lexi Mitz, Hayley Panet and David Steckel.

CJPAC is a national, independent organization whose mandate is to involve the Jewish community in the political process and foster Jewish and pro-Israel political leadership.

"The Action party is an important first step toward political engagement, helping Action attendees realize that politicians are human, and that one person can truly make a difference and have an impact on the political system," Kimel said.

"The Action party is unlike traditional political events, which is why we believe so many politicians and so many young people are attracted to it. Rather than try to compel people to attend events unfamiliar to them, CJPAC is committed to engaging our community at their level of comfort and working with them to grow their political interest and involvement."

While younger people bring a perspective, energy, and passion that is vital to politics, Kimel said, many don't see politics as an agent of change. "By bringing together young professionals and politicians, CJPAC helps open the eyes of young professionals to the opportunities that political engagement offers them."

Since 2007, the Action party has become CJPAC's largest event. A similar party is scheduled for Montreal on May 12. For more information about CJPAC, visit www.cjpac.ca.

Former CIJA CEO now a HIPPY

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The former CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) is being honoured by a Canadian charity that helps preschool children in need with early childhood education.

Hershell Ezrin will be fêted March 29 at the Sheraton Hotel by Home Instruction for Parents of Pre-School Youngsters of Canada (HIPPY Canada) for helping to promote the organization across the country.

Hershell Ezrin

HIPPY Canada is, according to its website, "a home-based education program that teaches parents to be their preschool children's first teacher and prepare their three-to-five-year-olds for school."

It's aimed primarily at immigrant families and single parents who may not be able to afford to send their children to preschool or daycare.

The program has its roots in Israel, where it was first created and developed in 1969 at the NCJW Institute for Innovation in Education at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Since then, HIPPY has been exported to multiple countries, including Australia, Austria, Canada, Germany, Italy, New Zealand South Africa and the United States.

It now serves more than 22,000 families worldwide, according to HIPPY Canada literature.

Speaking to The CJN earlier this month, Ezrin said he was "honoured" to be involved in an organization that "empowers and involves parents" in the education of their kids.

"[Hippy Canada] gives them the chance to integrate into Canada."

Ezrin and his wife, psychologist Dr. Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin, only recently became involved with HIPPY Canada, but they felt it was a project worth lending their names to, he said.

According to the non-profit group's website, one of HIPPY's main goals is to eliminate the link between poverty and low literacy rates in Canada.

Ezrin said his wife used to study early childhood development as part of her PhD work and also served as director of daycare evaluation for the City of New York.

As a result, both he and Sharon took a "great and long-term interest" in HIPPY.

He also noted that the U.S. arm of HIPPY was initially sponsored by former U.S. president Bill Clinton and his wife, current U.S. Secretary of State Hilary Clinton.

"One of my hopes is that any publicity that goes around this [gala dinner] will really help raise the profile of a very worthwhile program," he said.

Hoffman overcomes injury for silver at Canada Games

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

One of the best stories of the Canada Winter Games almost didn't happen.

Thornhill's Zac Hoffman, who broke his collarbone about six weeks before the opening ceremonies of the prestigious competition, had to furiously get through rehabilitation to make it back in time to compete at the Games.

Doctors hadn't given Hoffman much hope that he could be ready in time.

"When I broke my collarbone, the hospital basically told me that I wouldn't be able to go," said Hoffman, one of only two male mogul skiers from Ontario at the event. "But with lots of physiotherapy, I was able to make it back in time."

It was a tough stretch for Hoffman, who wanted to get back on the hills as soon as possible.

"Throughout the six weeks I was hurt, all I could basically do was go to physio and ride the bike," he said.

"All of my friends were going skiing and my teammates were traveling to B.C. and Utah. It was super frustrating."

Once the 18-year-old skier was cleared to race, he didn't have a lot of time to prepare.

"I got in two days of skiing before I went out to Halifax [for the Games], but those days were more about skiing carefully rather than [attempting] jumps or moguls," Hoffman said.

"Fortunately, my competition wasn't until well after the opening ceremonies, so it gave me some time to go over the course and get my legs back under me."

After finishing sixth in the singles event, Hoffman really got going in the duals, where two competitors race down the mogul hill and take a pair of jumps. Their total score is dependent on a combination of time, air and turns, with the winner moving on.

"I won four rounds to get to the finals," Hoffman said. "In the semis, I faced one skier from Quebec (Hugo Blanchette) who I think will be the next guy to make the Canadian National Team."

It forced Hoffman to take his game to the next level.

"I knew I had to push really hard if I wanted to beat him," Hoffman said. "I don't think I've ever skied that fast before."

Hoffman held on and made a clean back flip to advance to the finals, where he lost to Quebec's Simon Lemieux. Still it was good enough for a silver medal. "I'm totally happy with second," Hoffman said. "I couldn't really comprehend the fact that I was in the finals, I was just so excited."

Hoffman began mogul skiing at 10 years old, following his older brother, Josh, into the sport. "He was the reason I got into it," Hoffman said. "I just sort of followed him around when I was younger."

The middle child, who also gets encouragement from younger brother Noah, found it beneficial when Josh was also on the provincial moguls team. "He helped to push me," Hoffman said. "I'd work harder and try to get up to his level and then in later years, I could push him, too.

"We're not too competitive with each other," Hoffman added. "We don't have that brother hatred that some people might think of. I could always come and talk to him."

He also has his parents, Risa and Lloyd, around to help support him on his journey. "Without all that my parents do for me, there's no way I'd be able to do any of this," Hoffman said. "They get me to where I need to be, support me financially and do everything for me."

When Hoffman isn't out on the course training, he's either shooting or editing video, usually of the very sport he competes in. "Everything I've earned over the past few years has gone towards cameras and equipment," Hoffman said.

His folks helped out there, too. "My parents got me a MacBook Pro as a birthday and Chanukah present," Hoffman said. "The second I got that, my video editing was much improved."

Film school is something Hoffman would like to pursue one day, but first, he's going to try and go as far in moguls as he can.

"The ultimate goal, of course, is the national team," Hoffman said. "I'm just going to keep pushing myself to improve, and hope for the best."

Exploring conspiracy theories in popular culture

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Many of the paranoid themes in the pantheon of modern conspiracy theory come straight from the pages of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the early 20th century antisemitic Russian tract, a Canadian journalist says.

The unsubstantiated notion that evil forces, namely Jews, seek to achieve global domination by fomenting strife and instability was popularized by this notorious czarist forgery, Jonathan Kay argued last week in a lecture at Beth Tzedec Congregation to publicize his forthcoming book, Among the Truthers.

Kay, an editor and columnist at the National Post, said that the Protocols – which has been translated into numerous languages and which he described as "a terrible, terrible document" – has been a template for anti-Jewish conspiracy theorists since its publication in 1903.

Jonathan Kay

The Protocols became popular after the Bolshevik Revolution and World War I, he said.

With societies traumatized by these cataclysmic upheavals, people looked for "simple explanations" and scapegoats. They found them in the Protocols, which blamed Jews for the world's troubles.

"Jews were a convenient target," said Kay.

In a note of caution, he said that most contemporary conspiracy theorists are not antisemitic and that some are even Jewish.

But the conspiracy movement – a subculture on the Internet – always attracts antisemites who fervently believe that a small and malignant cabal of Jews control the world.

> 'Conspiracy theorists in the United States can't be ignored because they insinuate themselves into mainstream politics'

According to Kay, conspiracy theories are extremely pervasive in popular culture.

He said he was prompted to write Among the Truthers, which is scheduled to be published in the spring, after the Liberal party in Canada dismissed a candidate running in the 2008 election who claimed that 9/11 was planned by the Mossad and the United States rather than Al Qaeda.

In general, conspiracy theorists maintain that reality is an illusion, that unseen agents, from the CIA to the Masons, manipulate current events and that the mainstream media is complicit in their dark schemes.

While conducting his research, Kay stumbled upon antisemites in the "craziest corners" of the conspiracy movement. He met antisemitic UFO enthusiasts, as well as a left-wing anti-Zionist who dabbled in Holocaust denial.

But "enlightened" conspiracy theorists renounce and denounce anti-semitism so as to preserve their respectability, Kay said.

He went on to say that the recession of 2008 created a new conspiracy theory that U.S. President Barack Obama is a Muslim who wants to impose Islamic law on American society and destroy capitalism in the United States.

"This is crazy," said Kay.

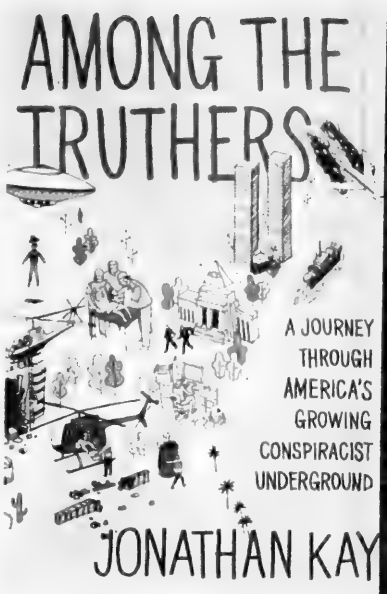
Radical Islamists obsessed with Zionism and Jews are also fond of conspiracy theories.

Conspiracy theorists in the United States can't be ignored because they insinuate themselves into mainstream politics, he said, citing members of the right-wing Tea Party and advocates of anti-Zionism.

Though a small proportion of conspiracy theorists are mentally unbalanced, the majority are quite sane, he pointed out.

The belief in conspiracy theory is thus a "political pathology" rather than a ment health problem.

Real conspiracies, however, have com and gone, he said, citing Al Qaeda's plot t destroy the World Trade Center in Man hattan in 2001 and the Watergate scand in the 1970s that forced the resignatio of Richard Nixon, the president of th United States.



JCT to honour federal cabinet minister

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

An Israeli college that educates using a unique blend of rigorous academic, scientific and religious studies is set to honour Canada's Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism, Jason Kenney.

Jason Kenney

On March 27, the Canadian Friends of the Jerusalem College of Technology will host its Gala Evening of Appreciation at the New Ritz-Carlton in Toronto and bestow upon Kenney the title of honorary dean of academic achievement.

According to the college, which was established in 1969, it's an institution that serves more than 3,500 students who "combine their academic studies with intensive study of Jewish law and literature, emphasizing ethical values, moral discipline, and the synthesis of tradition with modernity."

The college is in the midst of building a new $60-million Jerusalem campus for its women's college, and developing new degree programs in adaptive micro-optics and nano-optics, architecture, social work, water and solar engineering, and applied physics, according to gala literature.

In a statement prior to the dinner, gala chair, Larry Zeifman, said the college is "thrilled" to be honouring Kenney and through him, the entire Canadian government for its "steadfast and staunch support of Israel."

He added that in the current turmoil of today's Middle East "Israel has no better friend than Canada, and we need to thank Minister Kenney for this. Support of this dinner is a fine way to do that. Today's tumultuous times remind us that Canada has no greater friend in the region than Israel. Jerusalem College of Technology and its graduates contribute to this bond."

Canadian Friends of Jerusalem College of Technology said the institution is "one of the fastest-growing academic institutions in Israel (130 per cent growth in students in the past five years)... [and] contributes to the scientific, social and spiritual strength of Israel by graduating engineers and academics that are skilled in their chosen profession and erudite in their Jewish heritage."

For more information on the college and the gala contact dinner co-ordinator Shaindy Cohen Goldstein at 416-879-2065 or shaindy@rogers.com

Admiral (Ret.) Ami Ayalon is the former Director of the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency), and former Cabinet Minister in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government. Ayalon is the newly-appointed Chairman of the University of Haifa Executive Committee.

In addition to a distinguished military career, which brought him many honours, Ayalon chairs AKIM – the Israel Association for the Intellectually Disabled. He also heads the Forum to Promote Civilian National Service, providing non-military alternatives for Israelis who want to serve the state but are exempt from the draft. With Prof. Sari Nusseibeh of Al-Quds University, he formulated a grassroots peace initiative based on a set of core principles for two-state coexistence.

Educated in Israel and the U.S., at Bar-Ilan and Harvard, Ayalon brings a unique world view of the Middle East in general, and of Israel, in particular.

Goldwasser living day-to-day

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

On the morning of July 12, 2006, Karnit Goldwasser's life changed forever when her husband, Ehud, and his fellow Israel Defence Forces soldier Eldad Regev were kidnapped by the Lebanese terrorist group Hezbollah.

Karnit Goldwasser

The Second Lebanon War began as a result, and overnight, she became one of the most familiar figures in Israel.

For two years, Goldwasser turned over every stone seeking her husband's release. She met many of the world's leaders, and even confronted Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, looking for answers about Ehud and Eldad's conditions, and trying to bring about their safe return.

On July 16, 2008, the sad truth of her husband's and Regev's deaths tore at her heart, and indeed, the hearts of all Israelis. That day, the two soldiers' bodies were returned to Israel in a prisoner exchange with Hezbollah.

Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev were buried the next day with full military honours.

For Goldwasser, however, this was not the end of the story.

On June 25, 2006, 17 days before Hezbollah kidnapped her husband, Hamas attacked an IDF post on the Israeli-Gaza border. Two Israeli soldiers were killed, four were wounded and Cpl. Gilad Schalit was captured and taken into the Gaza Strip.

No Israeli has seen him since.

Goldwasser, who sees Schalit's release as a matter of extreme importance, made a special trip to Toronto to speak at a rally in support of Schalit last week.

The CJN met Goldwasser the day after the rally.

"This is not my job, and I am trying to move forward with my life," Goldwasser said. "However, it was important enough to leave everything and come to Toronto for Gilad.

"We should all raise our voices and be heard at all times. From my experience, I can tell you that sending letters and postcards to Gilad via the Red Cross does help," she said.

"I also realize that the Jewish communities in the Diaspora have a key role to play in the efforts of releasing IDF prisoners of war. The Jewish communities are very important to Israel and they should keep standing beside Israel at any given time."

For Goldwasser, the community's rally for Schalit showed unity and strength.

"I was proud to be a Jew yesterday. We are all for one and one for all," she said. "Besides donations, Israel needs moral and spiritual support. The State of Israel is very dear to me, and I understand it now much better than before."

She described how her loss has affected her on a personal level. "I live with a wound that will never heal, and it is something that you learn to live with. It is hard to plan for the far future, and sometimes I live day to day. Hopefully, I will establish my own family in the future."

Kent addresses gathering

"I thank you for your support and sympathy. We are here because the key to releasing Gilad from prison is in the hands of the decision-makers in Jerusalem," Noam Schalit said. "Keep up your pressure in order to persuade Gilad's captives to treat him as a human being with rights, rights [denied him] for the last five years."

Thornhill MP Peter Kent, the Canadian minister of the environment, said Canada is a friend and ally of Israel. "Israel is a beacon of light in an unstable region. Canada supports Israel and supports the release of Gilad Schalit," he said.

Gianni Alemanno, the mayor of Rome, and Riccardo Pacifici, the president of the Roman Jewish community, also expressed their support for Israel and Schalit. His struggle is also the struggle of the free world and its civilization against the dark forces of Islamic fundamentalism, Alemanno said.

PHYSICS WINNERS: This year's local Weizmann Canada Shalheveth Freier Physics Tournament was held March 7. Eight teams from four Toronto-area high schools built safes whose locks had to be broken into using the laws of physics. The winning team, from the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Vaughan campus, will compete in the international competition at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel on March 29 and 30.The winning team consisted of five Grade 12 students – from left, Sarah Edgerley, Daniela Chocron, Rachel Mailach, Courtney Firestone and Carly Pellow.

MUSICAL WIN: Students from Leo Baeck Day School's south campus, pictured with music teacher Patty Smith, placed first in the Kiwanis Music Festival of Greater Toronto's recorder ensemble category for ages 11 and under. The grade 4, 5 and 6 students meet weekly during recess and took part in the festival for the first time this year.

Ben Pearl

Golf tournament goes out of town

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

When Ben Pearl died of cancer in 1997, his sons searched for a way to honour his memory and support cancer research.

Michael Pearl said, "My dad had sponsored a golf tournament before, and my brother, Steven, and I are both golfers, so we thought that would be a great way to remember him and raise money."

Pearl, 52, a marketing consultant, said, however, that their tournament, named the Gentle Ben Charity Challenge, is "not your ordinary tournament.

"We've taken it out of town, to Bermuda, Las Vegas, Los Angeles, Jamaica, Hilton Head, Florida and Phoenix. We ask every golfer to raise $1,000. We've had as many as 92 golfers."

Half of them them have returned, he said, and some have raised as much as $15,000 or $16,000. "We've become like family."

Pearl said the charity supports such causes as the McEwen Centre for Regenerative Medicine, Charles Krowitz Burkitt's Lymphoma Research Fund, Lilah's Fund, and the Dr. Jay Charitable Foundation. It also operates in association with LWW Children's Foundation, which is dedicated to helping families that have suffered losses as a result of cancer or aneurysms.

The event, to be held this year in October, he said, "has morphed into a sports extravaganza. It's not a relaxing vacation, but we're there to help everyone out. We're like mother hens. We make sure everyone is happy and busy."

It is "kind of" a man's holiday, but some couples have taken part, he said.

Pearl is not looking for a pat on the back, he said, "but we've raised more than $1 million to date. This has made me enormously proud.

"It is a lot of work, but it is a labour of love. If our father is looking down, he is getting a lot of naches."

For information on this year's tournament, call Steven Pearl, 416-932-3588.

Global Seder to Fight Hunger helps Jews in need celebrate Passover

Jews in Toronto, Israel, former Soviet Union and Cuba need our help

By Taali Lester Tollman

As we celebrate Passover by sharing the holiday meal at our respective Seder tables along with friends and loved ones, the thought that other Jews in Toronto – and around the world – will not have enough to eat during the holiday, and year-round for that matter, is unfathomable.

But the truth is, in Toronto alone over 20,000 Jews live at, or below the poverty line, making their ability to put food on the table a challenge. In Israel and the Former Soviet Union (FSU), there are countless Jews in need who cannot feed themselves or their families adequately, while in Cuba, the absence of kosher for Passover foods make it a struggle to celebrate the holiday and their Jewish lives with joy and dignity.

United Jewish Appeal's Global Seder to Fight Hunger, which includes a city-wide Telethon on Sunday, April 3rd, has been created to assist those in our community, Cuba, the FSU and Israel who are the most vulnerable during the holiday season and beyond. Funds raised through this vital initiative will be allocated to purchasing the food and other staples needed to celebrate Passover.

Like any child his age, Desta, a ten year-old Ethiopian-Israeli boy living in Bat Yam, dreams about his future. But Desta also worries about the present; often there is not enough food in his home to feed his family and the only hot meal he receives is during lunchtime at school.

Please answer the call when contacted by volunteers for UJA's Global Seder to Fight Hunger on Sunday, April 3rd.

"It's hard for me concentrate sometimes because I'm hungry," Desta explains. "I like to take bread home from my lunch at school so I know I will have something to eat for dinner."

Sarah Afansieva, a 79 year-old Holocaust survivor living in Kishinev, Moldova, one of the FSU's poorest countries is also struggling. She is unable to sustain herself and relies on food from the Joint Jewish Distribution Committee (JDC), a partner agency of UJA Federation, in order to maintain her health and dignity.

"I try not to worry, but it is hard," says Sarah. "I know I can count on the Jewish community to help, and that eases my anxieties."

There are 1,500 Jews still living in Cuba, working hard to maintain their Jewish identity in a country that for years prohibited individuals from doing just that. Without access to kosher food, particularly on Passover, many feel alienated and alone during the holiday.

"We always received the kosher for Passover food packages from Canada," Hella Eskenazi remembers. "Because of this one small connection to my Jewish roots I wanted to indentify even more with my Jewish background and I began a journey which brought me to where I am now."

Over 3,000 attend Renewable Energy Conference in Eilat

By Daniel Horowitz

UJA Federation has long had a reputation for its vision and innovation, and for initiating unique, groundbreaking projects. This reputation has been strengthened by the impressive accomplishments of its ongoing 23-year partnership with the city of Eilat and the region of Eilot.

One of the key components of UJA Federation's strategic plan in Eilat and Eilot includes an investment in harnessing the region's vast natural assets – land and sun – to one day transforming the area into a global leader in renewable energy, development and technology.

Based on this February's fourth international UJA Federation sponsored Renewable Energy Conference in Eilat, which attracted more than 3,000 participants, UJA Federation's investment in the region is garnering impressive dividends. The conference is among the worlds' leading stages for presenting technological innovation, business opportunities, policies and implementation in the renewable energy field.

"I am blown away by how far this region has come in becoming a major player in the field of renewable energy, going from only 300 Conference delegates three years ago, to 3,000 today," said Richard Summers, UJA Federation's representative in the Eilat/Eilot Region. "UJA set out to create a sustainable change in the region by creating new industry and employment opportunities. No one would have believed five years ago that today, business, scientific and policy professionals are looking to Eilat/Eilot to determine the future direction for energy production and management."

"UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has supported the region in a variety of education, welfare and development projects over the past 20 years," said Evan Cooperman, a member of UJA Federation's Israel and Overseas Committee. "UJA Federation prides itself in taking carefully considered risks by funding initiatives where government and businesses have yet to jump on board. Our goal is to act as a catalyst to help high potential ideas gain the momentum needed to attract the best partners."

Toronto's Evan Cooperman addresses the 3,000 attendees at last month's Eilat Renewable Energy Conference.

With an eye always turned to the future, prior to the Renewable Energy Conference, the first International Youth Conference and Competition was held in which 25 young people from 14 countries competed for prizes by creating a viable business plan for renewable energy startup companies.

"Our leadership has always held a profound belief in the tremendous future of Eilat and Eilot since the beginning of our partnership over twenty years ago," said Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and a proud participant at the February conference. "They knew that great potential existed in Israel's most remote region and as such was a metaphor for the great potential of the country as a whole. As part of that belief in recent years, one of the key components to our strategy in Eilat and Eilot was to invest in renewable energy in the region, in its infancy, over four years ago. To hear, firsthand, from so many key players on a global stage, about how that investment is changing the face of the region, helping it become a global leader in renewable energy development and technology, is incredibly satisfying. The dream is quickly becoming a reality."

U.S. ties with Muslim Brotherhood revealing

An unusual article appeared in the Mar. 10 issue of the New York Review of Books – unusual in the sense that when it comes to discussing the Middle East, this august publication typically focuses on negative, one-sided critiques of Israel to the exclusion of much of the rest of the region.

So it was all the more surprising to see it publish a most revealing piece, "Our Secret Connections with the Muslim Brotherhood," by Wall Street Journal reporter Ian Johnson, author of the 2010 book, A Mosque In Munich: Nazis, The CIA, And The Rise Of The Muslim Brotherhood In The West.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Johnson shines a light on a largely unknown chapter in U.S. foreign policy stretching back to the Eisenhower administration, during which the United States tried to form alliances with the Brotherhood or its offshoots.

The idea was to court Islamic leaders from Muslim-majority countries, initially as part of a covert anti-communist campaign. And so, in 1953, one year before the Muslim Brotherhood was outlawed in Egypt, Eisenhower himself (according to his presidential archives) met with "The Honorable Saeed Ramahdan, Delegate of the Muslim Brothers."

Said Ramadan (to use the coventional spelling) was the son-in-law of Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Brotherhood in 1928, and the father of the well known "controversial" Swiss-born philosopher and Islamic scholar Tariq Ramadan. Under al-Banna, the Brotherhood relied on what Johnson calls "an interesting mixture of fundamentalism and fascism." (Since the term "fascism" is often overused, it's good to see Johnson define and clarify it as "reactionary politics and xenophobia"). Said Ramadan served as al-Banna's "foreign minister."

In the 1950s and '60s, the CIA supported Said Ramadan, who took over a mosque in Munich and turned it into one of the Brotherhood's most important centres. But he did very little, if anything, to fight communism. Ramadan "was more interested in spreading his Islamist agenda," Johnson writes.

Relations with Islamists fell off for a period, but were reinvigorated with the start of the Soviet war in Afghanistan in the late 1970s. The Americans backed the mujahideen, "some of whom morphed into Al Qaeda."

It's generally thought that former U.S. president George W. Bush was hostile toward Islam and Islamists, and that only under President Barack Obama, given his outreach to the Muslim world in his 2009 Cairo speech, did the American position change substantially.

Not so, according to Johnson. While in the immediate aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks, the United States targeted the Brotherhood for supporting terrorism, that changed during Bush's second term. By then, the Americans were contending with severe difficulties in Iraq and Afghanistan and hostile Muslim minorities in Europe.

Johnson explains: "The Bush administration devised a strategy to establish close relations with Muslim groups in Europe that were ideologically close to the Brotherhood, calculating that it could be an interlocutor in dealing with more radical groups, such as the home-grown extremists in Paris, London, and Hamburg. And, as in the 1950s, government officials wanted to project an image to the Muslim world that Washington was close to western-based Islamists. So starting in 2005, the State Department, taking account of the Brotherhood's rising power in Egypt and elsewhere, launched an effort to woo the Brotherhood."

Though this policy never paid off, and was arguably based on wishful thinking, it wasn't abandoned. According to Johnson, Obama kept some of Bush's people who had developed this strategy, even though many U.S. allies thought it was too risky.

Johnson notes the Brotherhood's doublespeak: "In countries where it aspires to join the political mainstream, it renounces the use of violence locally. Hence the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt says it no longer seeks to overthrow the regime violently – although its members there think nothing of calling for Israel's destruction."

The man widely acknowledged to be the Brotherhood's spiritual leader and, in Johnson's words, "very likely the most influential cleric in the Muslim world" is Sheikh Yusuf al-Qaradawi. While he projects a "moderate" voice, especially to the West, "he also advocates the stoning of homosexuals and the murder of Israeli children – because they will grow up and could serve as soldiers."

Johnson's research is alarming, to say the least, and worthy of our attention.

Jewish lawyers group formed in Ottawa

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The initiative of a young lawyer from Montreal has resulted in the formation of the newly constituted Ottawa Jewish Lawyers' Society (OJLS.)

Cory Olishansky, a graduate of the University of Montreal law school, practised in Montreal briefly before coming to Ottawa in 2007 to work for the federal government.

Hoping to meet other Jewish lawyers, he looked for a group like Montreal's Lord Reading Society, a well-known institution of Jewish lawyers in that city that has been in existence for half a century.

Surprised and disappointed to find that no such group exists in Ottawa, Olishansky decided to start one himself.

"The idea had been percolating in my head for some time," he said, and he spread the word by e-mail that he was holding an initial brainstorming session. A dozen people came to that first meeting and several got together again to define the goals and expectations of the group.

The group was launched March 1, with a meet-and-greet event at Prime 360 restaurant. More than 70 people attended, many of whom were anxious to hear Liberal MP Irwin Cotler speak on the topic of "The Iranian Four-Fold Threat: What's To Be Done?"

"I was blown away by the number of people who came," Olishansky said. "There were people of all ages and levels of experience in the profession, from law students and young lawyers to former Liberal deputy prime minister Herb Gray."

Jack Silverstone, a senior lawyer who attended the event, was very impressed with its success.

"All honours and recognition go to Cory, who just came into this community and ran with the ball," he said. "The event was excellent. Attendance was fantastic. I was very happy to see so many young lawyers, new to the bar. People were networking, speaking about important issues and about how they can become active in the community, as lawyers. It was a great opportunity to see old friends and meet new people."

Silverstone's comments were echoed by others in attendance. Dara Lithwick, also a federal government lawyer, sees the group as a "web where Jewish Ottawans are able to connect their personal and professional lives, an association where we can have Jewish lawyers coming together to work on areas of common interest and perhaps working together on causes right here in Ottawa."

Aaron Moscoe has been in private practice for nearly 30 years and he, too, found the event exciting. "It was a warm environment, a good opportunity to meet colleagues."

He said the choice of Cotler as speaker was "brilliant." Many in attendance had been his law students at McGill University and thought of him as their mentor.

The OJLS' future is unclear. There's a general consensus that there's a need and desire for such a group in Ottawa.

Referendum to be held to impeach rector

"You have no right to say you represent me, as a Queen's student, when voicing such opinions. You have not only offended me, but you have offended my history. You do not speak for me; you have abused and disgraced your office," Mendelsohn wrote.

Mendelsohn's letter in its entirety can be found at www.cjnews.com.

In a note posted by Queen's principal and vice-chancellor Daniel Woolf on the university's website, Woolf said he met with Day on March 10 to express his concerns about the context of the letter he sent to Ignatieff.

"He wrote the letter as rector, and not as an individual citizen. The university's position is that this was inappropriate," Woolf said.

"The views in the letter are not the issue... It's the context in which he communicated his personal opinion. Mr. Day's views do not and should not be seen as being representative of those of the University or Queen's students."

Woolf said that students and other members of the community contacted the university to say that Day, who is a student-elected representative, should be ousted from his post.

At a March 10 meeting of the Queen's student government, a petition that called for Day's impeachment gathered about 2,200 signatures and was presented to the assembly. A motion was passed to hold a referendum to decide his fate.

Meanwhile, pro-Israel students released statements in support of Ignatieff's stance.

In a letter addressed to Ignatieff, Mitchell Rattner, president of Queen's Israel on Campus, wrote "we admire your tenacity and your commitment to defending tolerance and safe space on campuses, even at the risk of disapproval or political backlash."

Paige MacPherson, vice-president external for the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students said "the obsessive vilification of Israel is not constructive, nor will it bring peace to the region."

The statement continued to praise Ignatieff "for his strong condemnation of IAW, and encourages other Canadian politicians to speak out on this issue."

And other Canadian politicians did speak out against IAW.

On March 9, Conservative member of Parliament John Baird and Liberal MP Joe Volpe spoke at a meeting sponsored by Carleton University's Israel Awareness Committee to denounce IAW.

The Ottawa Citizen reported that Baird told the gathering that it is "wrong and outrageous to equate what happened in South African with Israel," while Volpe added that calling Israel an apartheid state is an offence to the democratic values that Canada shares with Israel.

Ken Dryden

Liberal MP Ken Dryden also lent his voice to the controversy when he gave a speech on March 9 in the House of Commons condemning IAW.

"[IAW] is about intimidation and hate, where one voice overpowers and silences others – and cuts them off," Dryden said.

"It's time for students involved in Israeli Apartheid Week to move on to something worthy of all that's in them... our students and our universities can do much better."

University of Winnipeg President Lloyd Axworthy is apparently trying to do better.

On March 7, the university sponsored a panel discussion by an Arab-Jewish Dialogue group that featured two Jewish and two Arab speakers. Another Jewish-Muslim dialogue was scheduled by the university's theology department on March 10.

The Winnipeg Jewish Review reported that Axworthy wanted to take an active role in offering programs that counter the messages put forth by IAW organizers.

He said it's "the responsibility of a university to ensure that an issue that's as important as this be given a full and fair hearing as opposed to a one-sided hearing."

Tensions were running high last week at York University when Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) held an event to counter IAW called "Talk Peace. Stop Hate."

FSWC president Avi Benlolo reported that media personality Michael Coren, who was the featured speaker, was "ambushed" by a York student following the event.

"Mr. Coren was passionate in his defence of Israel's right to exist. It is extremely unfortunate that there are students who not only disagree with this position, but are willing to use violence to make their point," Benlolo said in a statement.

Coren said IAW "is about closing down debate around Israel and Palestine. It's morbidly consistent that someone behind such an approach would also try to assault someone who dares to support the Jewish state.

"I was fortunate to have a bodyguard to protect me from harm. I remain concerned about students who may face such violence without the benefit of the same protection."

A Philosopher and a Biblical Scholar in Conversation

The establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 was the culmination of three millennia of Jewish history stretching back to ancient biblical times. Can a Jew who rejects Zionism's commitment to a Jewish national homeland remain an authentic Jew? Does the denial of this commitment by the non-Jew amount to anti-semitism? Two renowned scholars discuss whether Judaism without Zionism is a contradiction in terms.

Tory MP wants Holodomor display in museum

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Conservative MP Joy Smith has added her voice to those calling for a permanent and separate gallery in the new Canadian Museum for Human Rights for the Holodomor, Joseph Stalin's mass murder through starvation of several million Ukrainian farming families in the 1930s.

The MP for the North Winnipeg riding of Kildonan-St.Paul – a strong supporter of the yet-to-be completed Winnipeg-based national museum, the first to be built outside Ottawa – released two press releases within a month on the subject, most recently on March 7. In the first – on Feb. 11 – she joined several Liberal MPs in calling for a special gallery for the Holodomor, which targeted Ukrainians who refused to accede to the Communist policy of collectivizing agricultural production. Smith noted that "Canada and several provinces recognize it as a genocide and believe it deserves a prominent place in the story of human rights. Our youth need to know the story. All Canadians, all people, need to understand what happened," she said.

Smith's views echo those of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association, which have been loudly campaigning to give the Holodomor equal standing in the museum with the Holocaust, which will have its own separate exhibit.

In January, the Ukrainian Canadian Canadian Congress urged supporters to send postcards to federal Heritage Minister James Moore, whose ministry is responsible for national museums, calling for the formation of a new content committee that is "truly representative of the Canadian population, inclusive, fair-minded and non-partisan."

The postcards showed Ukrainians behind a barbed-wire fence, highlighting the internment of 6,000 Ukrainians in Canada in World War I as enemy aliens.

In her second press release, released March 7, Smith reiterated her call for a separate space for the Holodomor.

"Since I was first elected in 2004, I worked diligently to secure funding for the Canadian Museum for Human Rights and its Winnipeg location," she said.

"The Holocaust stands out amongst the many human rights violations over the past century and led to the international recognition and condemnation of the act of genocide," she added.

"It is important to note, however, that the Holodomor also stands out amongst this past century's state-sponsored acts of mass murder. Taking place seven years before Hitler's Holocaust began, the Holodomor genocide set a horrific precedent of the targeted extermination of a specific population by a ruling state.

"Yet, the Holodomor genocide did not receive recognition, because Stalin and Communist Russia hid this atrocity through denial and decades of disinformation. Nevertheless, it is likely that Stalin's Holodomor was an archetype of mass slaughter for Hitler's Holocaust. Hitler would have witnessed the silence in the wake of the Holodomor by the international community."

The museum's communications director, Angela Cassie, said the place of the Holodomor has been taken into consideration during the planning process.

The museum, she noted, will include two permanent galleries – one each for the Holocaust and Canada's aboriginal peoples – and 10 other permanent zones. She said the Holodomor will have a permanent display in the "Mass Atrocity" zone, immediately adjacent to the Holocaust zone.

The "Mass Atrocity" zone will feature detailed information on the Holodomor and other similar events, and will provide educational opportunities for visitors to learn more about them.

"It is appropriate that Mrs. Smith should be representing the views of her constituents," Cassie said, referring to Kildonan-St. Paul, with its relatively large Ukrainian population and a rapidly declining Jewish one, "but our goal is to try to educate people about human rights."

She added that, unlike most museums, the displays in the human rights museum won't be static. They will be updated on a regular basis as more information becomes available. They will also be interactive and digitally accessible.

"It's unseemly to be comparing one national tragedy with another," said Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress. "We have had meetings with our colleagues at the Canadian Ukrainian Congress and have urged them to focus on the museum's core goals. We think that they get it."

At the same time, Farber said the CJC is very disappointed with the attitude of the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association, which continues to press forward with its lobbying efforts.

"We are saying to the Canadian Ukrainian community that they would do better to focus on educating Canadians about the Holodomor – which was a terrible tragedy – and its importance and stop trying to compare it to other tragedies," he said.

The $310-million museum, which is being built with funding from three levels of government and private donations, is due to open next year.

UJA Federation OF GREATER TORONTO

Montreal federation seeks new CEO

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After less than two years, Federation CJA is again looking for a chief executive officer.

Current CEO Andrés Spokoiny is leaving at the end of June, exactly two years after he began the job. He told The CJN he has accepted a "senior position" in a Jewish communal organization outside of Canada, which he expected to be confirmed this past Monday.

He insisted the decision was his own, but that it was an "excruciating" one made for "a mixture of personal, family and professional reasons."

Spokoiny, 42, an Argentine native who came to Montreal from Paris, said the agreement when he assumed the federation post was that it be for two years and then reviewed.

In the official announcement, federation president Jack Hasen and first vice-president David Cape said, "We thank Andrés for his contributions to our community during his time here, and we will continue to work closely with him in this transitional period."

No interim CEO has been named. Hasen and Cape say the organization will be run by senior managers and lay leaders until a new top professional is found.

They assured the community that Spokoiny's departure will not affect the budget allocation process, which normally wraps up at the end of this month, nor the implementation of Imagine 2020, a research project that has been conducted over the past year on the Montreal Jewish community's future and the federation's priorities.

"הפעילות הגופנית היחידה שאני עושה היא עזרה בנשיאת ארונות המתים של חברי, שעשו התעמלות וריצה כל יום בחייהם".

תודה לרוני בראלי על הקטע הנהדר הבא:
אתה ישראלי אם אינך צריך תרגום כשמדברים איתך על: בג"ץ, בד"ץ, מש"ק, ב"ה, ש"ס, ת"ש,רס"ר, שב"כ, קו 300, לעמוד בשלשות ולפתוח רווחים, שאלת קיטבג, ארזת בעצמך! צו שמונה, גימלים.

כשאתה יכול להשלים את המשפטים הבאים:
אנחנו על....
הכדור הוא....
בבזל יסדתי...
על הדבש...

לפחות פעם אחת:
עטפת מחברות ביום האחרון של החופש הגדול,
הרגשת לא טוב בטיול שנתי,
עשו עליך חרם,
הצעת חברות,
שיחקת ארץ-עיר (ושכחת שהחיה היחידה ב-ו' היא וירוס)
היית בהלוויה של חייל,
אתה יכול לעצום עיניים ולראות את:
סאדת יורד מהמטוס,
חיים יבין אומר "מהפך",
אריק שרון עם התחבושת,
אייכמן בתא הזכוכית,
יהורם גאון משחרר את החטופים באנטבה,
התחתונים הלבנים של הנשיא ב "מים לדוד המלך",
לחיצת היד המשולשת על המדשאה בוושינגטון,
יצחק רבין שר את "שיר לשלום",

ולפחות פעם אחת אמרת:
על החיים ועל המוות,
לא ישנתי כל הלילה,
אחרי הצבא אני אתפוס את המ"כ הבן  הזה,
ברכו את ה' המבורך.

Israeli shoe dealer appeals to Quebec premier

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal footwear store that is the new target of an anti-Israel boycott campaign is appealing to Premier Jean Charest for his intervention.

Solemates Inc., the Toronto area-based owner of Chaussures Naot at 4257 St. Denis St., has written to the premier denouncing the demonstrations that have been taking place outside the store on Saturdays since Feb. 12.

"This activity can only be described as a form of economic terrorism, specifically organized by a group of individuals who have a fundamentally anti-Israel agenda," wrote Solemates vice-president Max Lissoos in a letter copied to Montreal Mayor Gérald Tremblay.

"In recent weeks we have been confronted with a group of aggressive and abusive activists... interfering with shoppers, our staff and passersby on the street, demanding that our store should be boycotted as we sell products produced in Israel."

For more than 20 years, Solemates has been the exclusive Canadian importer and distributor for Naot, a shoe manufacturer which was founded in 1942 and is still based at Kibbutz Neot Mordechai in the Upper Galilee.

The St. Denis store mainly sells merchandise from Israel, but also from India, Romania, Portugal and Canada, he said.

In an interview, Lissoos said he's relying on reports from the store's manager and had not yet been present during one of the demonstrations himself.

This is the first time in Canada that Naot has been the focus of the worldwide boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel, Lissoos said. Solemates has been operating the St. Denis store and another on Monkland Avenue in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for several years. It also has retail outlets in Toronto and Calgary, and Naot footwear is sold to many independent stores across Canada, he said.

Lissoos said he doesn't understand why no police action has been taken that would put an end to the demonstrations. He contends they are disturbing the peace, disrupting commercial activity, and harassing staff and customers.

If the law does not allow the protests to be stopped, Lissoos thinks it should be changed.

Closing the Quebec operations would not be ruled out if "this nonsense" doesn't stop, he added. The two Montreal Naot stores employ 10 people.

The group Palestinian and Jewish Unity (PAJU) began holding demonstrations on Saturday afternoons in front of Boutique Le Marcheur on Oct. 2. Last month, the handful of protesters began moving between Le Marcheur and Naot, across the street.

Anti-boycott activist Sharon Freedman said that they now spend a half-hour at Le Marcheur, which stocks only a small amount of Israeli footwear, and 1-1/2 hours at Naot.

While the demonstrators number only about a half-dozen, their tone has changed, she said. Once peaceful, they now blow horns and shout, she said. On March 5, a police officer intervened to order them to lower the noise, Freedman said.

"They aren't stopping people from going in the store, but the atmosphere is intimidating," she said.

A motion, supported by the Liberals and the two other major parties, was presented to the National Assembly Feb. 9 condemning the long-running protests against Le Marcheur, owned by the Archambault family, and affirming the Quebec-Israel trade agreement. It was not debated because Québec solidaire MNA Amir Khadir refused to give his assent.

A similar motion was adopted March 22 by Montreal city council in a majority vote.

Lissoos wants some practical action that would end the demonstrations immediately, because he believes their "agenda is anarchistic and anti-free enterprise." He doesn't believe any other jurisdiction in North America would have allowed them to continue this long.

He pointed out that Naot is contributing to the economy of the Palestinians, as well as Israel. As he wrote to Charest: "The irony of the situation is that they are demonstrating against an Israeli factory which employs and has a significant collaboration with Palestinian families, who have factories in [east] Jerusalem and Hebron [in the West Bank] stitching the uppers of Naot footwear. These families have been working with Naot for 20 years and are dependent for their livelihood on Naot."

Lissoos further mentioned to The CJN that while the footwear is assembled in Israel, the leather is bought in Italy and the inserts are from Germany and Austria.

He said it's too early to tell if the protests are affecting Naot's sales in Montreal.

Lissoos said he would also be appealing to Montreal-area MP Irwin Cotler to see what he can do. Cotler is among a number of federal and provincial politicians who have visited Le Marcheur to show their support.

Lissoos is planning to post a sign in the St. Denis store explaining his company's side of the story, and perhaps launch a petition. However, he does not think the pro-Israel demonstrations that have taken place outside Le Marcheur and Naot are helpful because of the potential for conflict between opponents and the impact they are having on the neighbourhood's tranquility.

Schulich, Technion looking for a few good people

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Seymour Schulich is not a religious man, but his identification with the State of Israel and the Jewish people is one he wants to share with young people. His message to them is clear: it's time to step up, get involved and support an Israeli institution that develops the human resources that can help ensure Israel's continued survival and prosperity.

The institution to which Schulich is referring is the Technion, the Haifa-based educational facility renowned for developing human capital and serving as a cornerstone of Israel's technological and scientific infrastructure.

Schulich will be bringing his message to a select group of young adults at a March 31 "grand reception" at the Park Hyatt Hotel, sponsored by the Canadian Technion Society's Generation Next and JUMP, the Jewish Urban Meeting Place.

"I want to say to those kids, it's not a matter of religion," Schulich, 71, explained. "It's that you're in our tribe. Whether you like it or not, when the chips are down, if you are religious or not, this is the team you're on. You better recognize it and help."

"To me, Israel is a great insurance policy for our tribe. I hope we never have to cash it in, but you never know."

Schulich, who made his money in the resources sector, said growing up in Quebec, facing antisemitism and reading history made him sensitive to the potential for danger to the Jewish people. Ultimately, "we stand alone," he said.

He was particularly incensed by the way U.S. President Barack Obama snubbed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at the White House a year ago. Among other indignities, the president abruptly interrupted a meeting with Netanyahu to have dinner with his family. "I said, the reality is that we can't rely on anybody but ourselves."

Partnering with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, World ORT and the Government of Israel, he gave $25 million to upgrade 850 Israeli classrooms with computers and whiteboards. "We all have skin in the game, so I think this will be a great project," he said.

Ten years ago, looking to support an Israeli educational institution, as he has numerous Canadian universities, Schulich investigated a number of Israeli schools and settled on the Technion. "I kicked all the tires and really liked what I saw," he said.

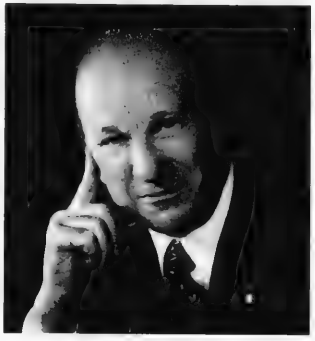
The Technion is an incubator of Israeli innovation despite having the smallest endowment pool among Israeli universities. Though it educates only 12,500 students, its graduates go on to provide more than 70 per cent of the country's CEOs of high tech industries. In addition, 90 per cent of Israeli start-ups are led by Technion grads, he said.

In 2006, Schulich donated $22 million to the school's chemistry faculty – a faculty close to his heart since as an undergrad at McGill University, he studied the same subject for two years before realizing his talents lay elsewhere.

A mining mogul, Schulich said he didn't make his first philanthropic donation until age 43 and "the first serious money I gave was at 55."

If you want to help, "you can give time, talent or treasure. I can give treasure and if you have treasure, it's the easiest to give," he said.

Hershel Recht, national development director of the Canadian Technion Society, said "the event is about young leadership and...why the smart money supports the Technion."



Seymour Schulich

The society, like other community agencies, is looking ahead to a time when current leaders and donors are no longer around. "The question is, where's the next generation?" he said.

The society's answer, in part, is its Generation Next, a group of 14 core members representing a variety of professions.

Young professionals may not have the funds to contribute immediately, Schulich said, but they can give of their time and talent. The society is on the lookout for young people to pick up the reins and develop into the next generation of leaders.

"I hope they become directors of the organization...I'm looking for people who will identify people who give cash and be interested. We need energy and young people."

"I want people to learn more about the organization and get involved," Schulich said. "Personally, I think it's one of the best things in Israel to do."

March of Living director shares survival stories

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When March of the Living national director Eli Rubenstein shares inspirational stories about Holocaust survival later this month, he hopes to inspire people to put their empathy to good use.

Eli Rubenstein

Rubenstein said he will use the chassidic Jewish tradition of storytelling during the March 30 lecture titled "Stories to Heal a Broken World," which is sponsored by the University of Toronto's Centre for Diaspora and Transnational Studies.

"I'm using storytelling because there is a chassidic idea that the act of telling a story itself can save the world," Rubenstein explained.

"When you hear a story you become part of the story. You place yourself in the shoes of the person in the story and you develop, probably the most important human quality, which is empathy. If you have empathy, that is the key to making the world a better place."

Rubenstein, who is also the founder of the Canadian March of Remembrance and Hope program, said that storytelling is a powerful tool because it can inspire people to act.

"When you tell a story, people are drawn into the characters, drawn into the narrative and they may ask themselves, 'What would I have done and what can I do in some small way to emulate the heroism and the courage of the people who resisted during those times of darkness?'" he said.

Rubenstein said that through March of the Living, he has been exposed to "exceptionally moving and touching moments of reconciliation and healing," and he hopes to share those stories with the gathering.

"These are stories of heroism and courage and righteousness and bravery that existed in the Jews who resisted the Nazis and the Jews who saved each others' lives."

Rubenstein said he recently heard an idea from Naomi Azrieli, the executive director of the Azrieli Foundation which publishes Holocaust testimonials, that resonated deeply with him.

"Nobody survived the Holocaust without the help, sacrifice and courage of somebody else. Somebody had to open a door for you, someone had to give you a smile, give you hope, give you shoes, bread, a helping hand," Rubenstein said.

"So much of the Holocaust [narrative] is tied up with understanding the barbarian cruelty – That is real and we have to understand that... but there isn't a single survivor today who isn't alive because of the heroism of either his fellow Jews or... people who are righteous among the nations who risked their lives to save them."

Rubenstein referred to the controversy that arose last year following the publication of Jenny Peto's master's thesis titled "The Victimhood of the Powerful: White Jews, Zionism and the Racism of Hegemonic Holocaust Education," which accused Jews of using Holocaust education to maintain a victim identity and promote their Zionistic ideologies.

Rubenstein called the allegations "harsh and unfounded," and added that he hopes the stories he shares at the lecture will help people better understand the goal of programs like March of the Living.

"[The goal is] to heal ourselves and the world of the wounds of the past, by confronting humanity's tragic history in the very places where the actual events unfolded."

Ato Quayson, an English professor and the director of the centre, said he wanted Rubenstein to be a part of the upcoming event because "he is a great collector of stories and a storyteller himself. He is such a great communicator."

He said he hopes the stories will be used for "healing purposes" and will "help us understand the world and how to live in it."

He added that the purpose of story telling is "to give the listeners a chance to pause and wonder about the degree of inhumanity" that humans are capable of.

"Man is capable of all kinds of beauty, but they are also capable of the worst damnation," Quayson said.

"It doesn't matter whether I'm Jewish or not... it doesn't matter whether I'm African and I'm familiar with African slavery. All that matters is that I'm human and that I'm sensitive to the pain of others."

U of T symposium focuses on Nazi ghettos

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A Canadian scholar launched a recent symposium on Jewish ghettos in Nazi-occupied Europe by observing that the topic has become one of the most vibrant ones in contemporary Holocaust studies.

After years of neglect, it has morphed into a focal point of interest among specialists, said Doris Bergen, who holds the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies at the University of Toronto.

With these introductory comments, Bergen kicked off the half-day symposium, which took place March 6 at the Munk School for Global Affairs.

It was sponsored by the Chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe Chair in Holocaust Studies, U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies, the faculty of arts and science, the German and European studies department, the department of history and the Konstanty Reynert Chair in Polish history.

The featured speakers, Samuel Kassow and Dan Michman, respectively analyzed the Oyneg Shabbes archives from the Warsaw ghetto and the origin of ghettos under Nazi rule.

After an intermission, three young and upcoming Canadian and American historians specializing in the Holocaust responded to their talks.

Kassow, the Charles H. Northam professor of history at Trinity College in Hartford, Conn., focused on the Oyneg Shabbes Archive.

Comprising 25,000 to 35,000 sheets discovered in 10 metal boxes and three milk cans after World War II, the archive has been stored at the Jewish Historical Institute in Warsaw ever since.

Portraying life in the doomed Warsaw ghetto, which was liquidated by the Nazis after the 1943 uprising, the archive consists of diaries, documents, commissioned papers and even restaurant menus.

Describing the archive as "history by the people, for the people," Kassow, a son of a Holocaust survivor, praised its compilers, calling their activities "a sublime act of resistance" in the face of Nazi oppression.

The archive was secretly established by Emanuel Ringelblum – a Marxist historian, social worker and politician born in 1900 and murdered in 1944 – and a group of Jewish writers in 1941, said Kassow, who was introduced by Anna Shternshis, the Al and Malka Green associate professor of Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto.

Oyneg Shabbes was conceived before the Nazis decided to exterminate the Jews of Europe in a systematic campaign of destruction, said Kassow, whose latest book, Who Will Write Our History? Rediscovering a Hidden Archive from the Warsaw Ghetto, is an examination of Oyneg Shabbes.

Calling it an expertly organized project, Kassow said it studied 80 different subjects under various team leaders. "He understood the importance of contemporaneous witnesses," he noted.

Like a good newspaper editor, Ringelblum asked his "reporters" to submit objective reports so that the legitimacy of the archive would not be questioned in the future.

In terms of its mission, Oyneg Shabbes evolved, first reporting on conditions in the crowded ghetto and then collecting material on deportations. Its members continued working even as conditions deteriorated drastically.

Rather than demeaned by the terrible times in which he lived, Ringelbum was ennobled by them, Kassow said.

All but three of his Oyneg Shabbes colleagues were killed in the Holocaust. Of the three survivors, only one knew where the archive had been buried. The 10 metal boxes were unearthed amid the ruins of Warsaw in September 1946. The milk cans were found in December 1950. The rest of the archive, thought to be under the foundations of China's embassy, was never found.

Michman, the chief historian of Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem, was introduced by Rebecca Wittmann, an associate professor of historical studies at U of T.

Noting that 1,040 ghettos were created by the Nazis, Michman said only about 20 have been exhaustively studied by scholars.

Michman, who doubles as a professor of modern Jewish history at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv, argued that ghettos were initially not an integral part of the Nazi master plan to cleanse Europe of Jews.

He cited an example. Ghettos in the Soviet Union, occupied by Germany after the summer of 1941, were set up only after the first wave of Nazi killings there, said Michman, the author of The Emergence of Jewish Ghettos during the Holocaust, published recently.

The Nazis, perhaps inspired by the claim of antisemitic German historian Peter-Heinz Seraphim that the "Jewish peril" originated in ghettos, first used the ghetto to contain Jews.

Referring to the work of U.S. historian Christopher Browning, Michman explained that Germany's Nazi regime may have turned to ghettos as a solution after the failure of its Jewish expulsion policy.

Later, the Nazis sent ghetto inhabitants straight to death camps such as Auschwitz and Treblinka, said Michman, whose father, Joseph, was a former general director of Yad Vashem.

Following a break, Michman's and Kassow's observations were discussed by three young historians.

Sylwia Szymanska-Smolkin, a Polish-born PhD candidate in history and Jewish studies at U of T, is writing a dissertation on Polish police and the Warsaw ghetto.

Elizabeth Strauss, a PhD candidate in history at the University of Notre Dame, is finishing a thesis on the elderly in the Lodz and Vilna ghettos.

Anna Hajkova, a PhD candidate in history and Jewish studies at the University of Toronto, is completing a dissertation on inmate society in the Theresienstadt concentration camp.

With the academic portion of the symposium at an end, Toronto singer Mitch Smolkin and pianist Nina Shapilsky performed songs from the Nazi ghettos.

Correction

The article "Fed. govt. gives shul accessibility grant" (March 10) included an incorrect location for Gan Yeladim Day Care. Gan Yeladim is on the upper level of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. As well, Gan Yeladim supervisor Shelley Wise was a member of the team that applied for the federal grant to improve accessibility at the synagogue. Kadimah Educational Centre supervisor Marcel Cohen wrote a letter of support stating how an elevator would be of benefit, but the final application was prepared by Beth Emeth's executive director Pearl Grandland and building manager Maxim Varshavsky.

Students join in Carmel fire clean-up

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Inspired by his cousin who was killed during the four-day forest fire that ravaged the Carmel region in northern Israel last December, Ilan Mann was determined to be a part of the rehabilitation effort.

Mann, 21, a fourth-year fine-arts student at York University, remembers the night his mother called to give him the tragic news.

His cousin, 28-year-old Topaz Even Chen Klein, was one of the 40 prison guards killed in the fire that was caused on Dec. 2 by a boy who threw a burning hookah pipe coal into an open area in the woods.

When the prison guards were en route to evacuate the Damun Penitentiary, a fallen tree blocked their path and the flames quickly engulfed the bus they were riding.

Mann, who has a strong connection to Israel, having visited a number of times, and involved himself with Jewish campus groups including Hillel and Hasbara Fellowships, said he decided to approach Josh Cooper, the executive director for the Jewish National Fund (JNF)of Canada, when he learned about his cousin's death.

Alexandra Lorenzetti, left, Tracy Goldman, Rebecca Woods Baum, Jess Weiser, Zach Paikin and Ilan Mann planted trees with Jewish National Fund in Lavi Forest in the Galilee.

"I came up with the idea for the trip that very same night, and I spoke with JNF the next morning. They were immediately helpful," Mann said.

Within a few weeks, JNF organized a trip that sent five students from Toronto and Montreal to Israel from Feb. 20 to 27 to aid in the clean-up and fire prevention effort.

Rebecca Woods Baum, the outreach and program co-ordinator for JNF, said that part of the fire prevention strategy is to get rid of the branches that hang lower to the ground so that if a fire does break out, it doesn't spread as quickly, and doesn't spread to the treetops.

"Some of the students got really scratched up... it's like their war wounds," she said with a laugh.

The trip included visits to other JNF sites including Idmit Park, Lavi Forest in the Galilee, and Halutsiyot, which is a settlement for the evacuees of the Gaza disengagement in 2008.

The group also volunteered to restore areas of the Carmel that were destroyed by the fire, "man-made areas like picnic areas, places where children would be able to play," Woods Baum said.

Mann said that when he first laid eyes on the damage caused by the fire, which destroyed an estimated five million trees and claimed the lives of 44 people, he was amazed by what he saw.

"There was a part where we could see exactly where the fire ended... We were able to see how lush the forest was and then we were able to see the absolute devastation that the fire caused," Mann said.

"When I first saw it, it was incredibly devastating to see the mass amount of damage that was done. When it was put in the context of the amazing rehabilitation work that JNF is doing, not just in the Carmel but all around the country, it really motivated me to get involved and to get working for the rest of the trip."

At one point during their clean-up effort, the students visited the site of the bus tragedy, and Mann was able to recited the mourner's Kaddish for his cousin and all the other victims.

"We were able to tie a ribbon around the memorial. It was obviously very moving to be able to stand in the exact spot where it happened," Mann said.

Woods Baum, who said that she was taken aback by the blackened landscape that had replaced the lush greenery, estimated that it could take 20 years for the forest to be replenished.

But because the forest in the Carmel region was natural, JNF foresters are going to give it time to see if some of the trees begin to grow back naturally.

"Hopefully, there will be trees that the roots are deep enough that they can regenerate," Woods Baum said.

She said she was encouraged when she saw grass and flowers growing in some areas.

"It's a start, but it's very stark because you see green, but then if you look closely, you see that everything [around it] is black."

Mann said that while there is still so much to be done, he's motivated by Israelis who are eager join the rehabilitation effort.

"People from the age of 11 years old... to the age of 85 are using their weekends and coming after work and taking a few days off to bring their families to clean up the area," he said.

Try some different desserts for Purim

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

Many of the best-known food writers and media personalities in the Greater Toronto Area are Jewish women. Some are Torontonians by birth, while others have made the GTA their adopted home.

People who immediately come to mind are Bonnie Stern, Rose Reisman, Norene Gilletz, Lucy Waverman, Daphna Rabinovitch, Susan Mendelson and Dufflet Rosenberg.

Since Purim is close, it's an opportune time to focus on desserts. Many of the women listed here generously contributed recipes to the Downtown Jewish community School's 30th anniversary cookbook (2010). Mendelson, Rabinovitch and Rosenberg all sent dessert recipes, which is no surprise, as baking has figured prominently in their careers.

Rabinovitch, who co-hosted Canadian Living Cooks on the Food Network, was also the director of Canadian Living magazine's test kitchen.

Rosenberg is the founder of Dufflet, her eponymous baking empire. The company supplies tens of thousands of cakes weekly to some 600 food establishments in the GTA.

Among local foodies, Rosenberg is regarded as a trailblazer, because she was one of the first local pastry chefs to specialize in high-end gourmet fare.

Mendelson, the author of 10 cookbooks, is a Toronto native who makes her home in Vancouver. She is known for putting the Nanaimo bar on the culinary map, but in Vancouver, it was her cheesecakes that first propelled her to fame.

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH'S CHERRY AND HAZELNUT RUGELACH

8 oz. cream cheese, softened
8 oz. unsalted butter, softened
1/2 cup granulated sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. vanilla
2 cups all-purpose flour
1/3 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup packed light brown sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup chopped toasted hazelnuts
1 cup cherry jam
1 egg, lightly beaten
1/4 cup granulated sugar

In bowl of electric mixer using paddle attachment, cream together cream cheese and butter until light and aerated. Beat in sugar and salt. Beat in vanilla. Using wooden spoon, gradually stir in flour until just combined and dough is formed. On lightly floured surface, knead dough very gently into a ball. Cut ball into quarters. Wrap each quarter in plastic wrap and refrigerate for 1 hour.

To make the filling, mix together granulated and brown sugars, cinnamon and hazelnuts.

On floured surface, roll 1 ball of dough into a 10-inch circle. Spread 1/4 cup of jam over surface, and sprinkle with 1/2 cup of the filling. Cut circle into 12 equal wedges.

Starting with the wide edge, roll up each wedge. Place cookies, with points tucked underneath, on parchment paper-lined cookie sheets. Chill for 30 minutes. Repeat with remaining balls of dough. Brush tops of each cookie with egg and sprinkle with sugar. Bake in centre of preheated oven at 350 for about 20 minutes or until lightly browned. Cool on pan for 5 minutes. Transfer to racks to cool completely. Makes 48 rugelach.

YOUR BASIC CHOCOLATE CHEESECAKE

From Mama now cooks like this! The Best of Susan Mendelson (Whitecap Books, 2006)

Chocolate Crust
1 1/2 cups chocolate wafers, crushed
1/3 cup butter, melted

Preheat oven to 350. Mix and press wafers and butter into a 9- or 10-inch springform pan. Bake 5 minutes.

Filling
1 lb. spreadable cream cheese
2/3 cup sour cream
1/2 cup sugar
2 tsp. vanilla extract
7 oz. semi-sweet chocolate
1 oz. bitter chocolate
2 large eggs
2 oz. shaved chocolate or chopped nuts

In a large mixing bowl, combine cheese, sour cream, sugar and vanilla and beat until smooth. Melt chocolate over hot water. Add to cheese mixture, beating until smooth. Add eggs and beat for 5 minutes. Pour filling into crust. Bake in preheated oven 40 to 45 minutes.

Sour Cream Topping
1 cup sour cream
1 to 2 tbsp. of your favorite flavouring
2 tbsp. sugar

Mix and spoon gently over cheesecake and return to oven for 5 minutes. When cooled, garnish with shaved chocolate or nuts. Yields 12 servings.

Jewish communities mobilizing for Japan

Uriel Heilman
JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish organizations in North America are mobilizing their responses to the massive earthquake and tsunami that struck Japan on Friday.

IsraAid, an Israel-based co-ordinating organization for 17 Israeli and Jewish humanitarian groups, said Friday that it has two teams of rescue personnel, emergency medical officers and water pollution specialists ready to deploy to Japan but was looking for ways to reach the affected area.

Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN on Monday that his organization had set up a donation campaign in partnership with IsraAid to send Canadian help to Japan.

Linda Kislowicz, CEO at UIA Federations Canada, confirmed that all of the Canadian federations had set up donation campaigns over the weekend, either through IsraAid or via the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). Federation CJA in Montreal has partnered with JDC.

Ve'ahavta, the Toronto-based Jewish humanitarian organization, had also set up an emergency response fund in partnership with the JDC, according to its website.

Because the airports in the affected area are flooded and Tokyo-area airports closed on Friday, IsraAid said it was exploring the possibility of flying to a nearby country and then trying to make it to northeast Japan, where the tsunami has killed hundreds and devastated cities and towns.

"We're in touch with local groups to check the situation in the area," Shachar Zahavi, chairman of the group, told JTA in a telephone interview. "We're trying to get to the closest airport and then get to the affected area from there."

Chabad reported that its emissary in Tokyo said the Jewish community there largely was spared any serious injury or damage from the 8.9-magnitude quake that rocked the city Friday morning. The Israeli Foreign Ministry said late Friday that some 25 Israelis in Japan still had not contacted family or embassy officials to report on their safety.

ZAKA, the rescue and recovery organization, announced Friday that it would send a search-and-rescue team to Japan.

The UN-recognized, Israel-based ZAKA International Rescue Unit has assisted at natural disasters around the world, including Haiti – it was the first Israeli delegation to arrive on the scene – the tsunami in Thailand and the hurricane in New Orleans.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel would help in whatever way possible.

The Japanese consul in Israel, Mitoshiko Shinomya, told the Israeli news website Ynet that he was heartened by the Israeli government's offer of assistance. "Israel officially offered its help an hour after the earthquake struck," Shinomya said. "It is very heartwarming, but at this point we do not know exactly what the extent of the damage is, so it is difficult for us to say what can be done."

The Jewish Federations of North America set up an emergency relief fund to help those in affected areas and urged local federations to do the same. "We are determined to provide emergency relief as quickly as possible and to work with our partners to provide support over the longer term as well," said Fred Zimmerman, chairman of the Jewish Federations' emergency committee.

The organization said it is working with its partner the JDC, which also started a Japan/Pacific disaster relief fund, to support relief efforts.

"JDC is now conducting an up-to-the-minute assessment of the situation in Japan and the Pacific Rim and has activated its network of partners to determine critical, immediate needs of the hardest-hit areas," the JDC said in a statement Friday.

B'nai Brith International and the Orthodox Union also established an earthquake emergency fund. A spokesperson for American Jewish World Service (AJWS), which played a leading Jewish role in responding to the massive 2004 Indian Ocean tsunami that devastated parts of Indonesia, Thailand and Sri Lanka, said it would not be responding to the Japan tsunami because AJWS, which works in the developing world, does not have a partner organization in Japan.

The ZAKA International rescue team is on its way to assist in the aftermath of the Japanese earthquake last week. ZAKA assisted in the recovery in Haiti after a devastating earthquake struck the island country last January. [FLASH90 photo]

The devastating tsunami triggered by the biggest earthquake on record in Japan has at press time claimed more than 1,000 lives along the northeastern coast after a wall of water swept away everything in its path.

Thousands of residents were evacuated from an area around a nuclear plant after radiation levels rose in the reactor, but at press time there was no word on whether there had actually been a leak.

Donations to be used for Japan/Pacific disaster relief can be made at https://jdc.org/donation.

Canada condemns Itamar massacre

Amos Harel
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Two days after Palestinian terrorists massacred five members of an Israeli family while they slept in their home in Itamar in the West Bank, the Israel Defence Forces sent reinforcements and began its investigation into the matter.

The victims of the attack were Rabbi Udi Fogel, his wife Ruth and three of their six children, 11-year-old Yoav, four-year-old Elad and three-month-old Hadas. Three children survived – 12-year-old Tamar, eight-year-old Ro'ie and two-year-old Shai.

Over the weekend, Canadian politicians spoke out against the murders.

On Saturday, Minister of Foreign Affairs Lawrence Cannon extended the country's condolences to the remaining family members and said Canada strongly condemns the "heinous" and "criminal act of terror against the Israeli people. The brutal killing of the five Israelis, including children, cannot be justified."

Cannon also called on the Palestinian Authority (PA) to "co-operate fully in the investigation."

In a statement on Sunday, Liberal Opposition leader Michael Ignatieff called the killings "an act of terrible violence and cruelty" and extended his party's sympathies to the family.

He added that he hopes the "murderer will be brought to justice, and that this act will not achieve its aim of further diminishing efforts for peace and stability."

Representative organizations of the Canadian Jewish community also denounced the attack.

On Saturday, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Canadian Council on Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, issued a joint statement condemning "the gruesome murders" and urging the community to make donations to the UJA Victims of Terrorism Fund.

CIC chair Moshe Ronen termed the event a "slaughter" and "an unspeakably heinous act" and urged the international community and the Palestinian Authority to "unequivocally condemn" the massacre.

"More importantly, the Palestinian Authority and its president must immediately order an end to the anti-Israeli and anti-Jewish incitement that has long become part of daily life in their official media, schools and mosques," Ronen said. "Any tolerance of this incitement creates a toxic atmosphere in which the brutal slaying of a young Israeli family may seem the logical course of action for some."

Steven Cummings, national chair of CIJA, said the Canadian Jewish community's hearts "go out to the remaining children, now left orphans, to the community where they live, and to Israel which mourns this terrible tragedy."

He added: "There are reports that the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which is part of Fatah, has proudly claimed responsibility. If this proves to be the case, it will not be sufficient for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to merely denounce the attack. He needs, without delay, to disarm and disband a terrorist group operating within his own organization."

The Israeli probe into the murders is being overseen by the Samaria District brigade commander, Col. Nimrod Aloni, and the IDF commander in the West Bank, Brig.-Gen. Nitzan Alon. The conclusions will be submitted to chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Benny Gantz.

Military sources confirmed Sunday that the authorities mishandled the initial signal triggered by the electronic security fence ringing the settlement when two Palestinian terrorists climbed over the fence and killed the Fogels and three of their children.

While Itamar is protected by a civilian security firm, the Givati infantry company responsible for the area oversees a much wider strip of territory that stretches across the northern West Bank. Another issue to be investigated is the extent to which the Givati Brigade supervises the settlement's security procedures.

A preliminary probe into the killings found that a civilian security guard who rushed to the fence the signal came from believed that the alarm had been triggered by an animal.

The IDF may enforce more stringent rules, such as notifying a senior officer whenever a fence alarm is sounded. That officer, perhaps a company commander in charge of the area, will have sole authorization to determine whether a false alarm has occurred.

Security personnel in settlements across Samaria have complained that the fences around the communities trigger too many false alarms.

Central Command has received reinforcements assigned to help if violence escalates across the West Bank, particularly in areas of tension between settlers and Palestinians. Possible flash points are the settlements near Nablus, the outposts in the Shiloh Valley just north of Ramallah, and the Hebron region.

Still, this realignment is relatively small compared with the scope of forces that were deployed on the ground after similar terrorist attacks during the height of the second intifadah.

The IDF and the Shin Bet security service continue to make wholesale arrests in an effort to track down the killers. So far, more than 20 Palestinians from villages near Itamar have been detained.

Army sources say the authorities will be able to find those responsible for the attack relatively soon. The Palestinian Authority is playing only a minor role in the manhunt.

In related developments, Abbas called the killing "despicable" and "inhuman and immoral."

"A human being is not capable of something like that," Abbas said in Arabic in an interview Monday morning on Israel Radio, in which his words were translated into Hebrew by the interviewer.

"Had we had advance information, we would have prevented this," Abbas said of the Sabbath eve attack on the Fogel family. He also said the PA would work to find the killer or killers responsible and that he has agreed a request by Israel to launch a joint investigation.

Abbas, who called Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday to offer his condolences – which Netanyahu called "weak and mumbled statements" – took issue during the interview with Netanyahu's accusation that the Palestinian Authority incites against Israel in its mosques and schools. He offered to set up an Israeli-Palestinian-American committee to look into the allegations.

Meanwhile, the ministerial committee on settlement affairs voted after Friday night's terror attack in Itamar to approve construction of 400 housing units in four West Bank settlements.

The Palestinian Authority and the United States condemned the plan.

Israel, UNESCO to teach Holocaust

Israel and UNESCO have signed an agreement to promote Holocaust education and combat its denial. The agreement signed in Paris between Israel and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization commits to the establishment of a centre within the organization devoted entirely to developing and promoting Holocaust education and combating its denial worldwide. The centre will function in accordance with resolutions adopted at the UN General Assembly in New York and UNESCO, according to Israel's Foreign Ministry. Israel will fund part of the project "after reaching understandings with UNESCO regarding its treatment of political issues on the agenda," according to the ministry. UNESCO director-general Irina Bokova and Israel's permanent delegate to UNESCO, Nimrod Barkan, signed the agreement.

Food event in Spain cancelled

An Israeli food event in Spain was cancelled after receiving threats from a Basque terror group. Israeli food month in the tourist city of Hondarribia, in the Basque region of Spain, was scheduled to begin last Wednesday. It was cancelled following threats from the ETA terror group, which supports the Palestinian struggle against what it calls "Israeli occupation," Yediot Achronot reported.

Foreign workers' children get reprieve

Israel has postponed the deportation of hundreds of children of foreign workers by several months. Interior Minister Eli Yishai announced his decision last Wednesday, saying he did not want to disrupt the children's school year, according to reports. "I have instructed the enforcement regarding families with children learning in Israeli schools to be postponed by a number of months," Yishai said. Protests have been stepped up in recent weeks against the deportation of 400 children of foreign workers, boosted by the presentation of an Academy Award to the film Strangers No More, a short documentary by American filmmakers Kirk Simon and Karen Goodman that chronicles the efforts of the Bialik-Rogozin School in south Tel Aviv to educate and integrate students from 48 countries, many the children of foreign workers. More than 100 of the school's students are under the threat of deportation, including one of the film's stars, Esther Aikpehae, 12, who fled with her father from South Africa after her mother was murdered. The deportations had been expected to begin this week.

UN human rights chief must be held accountable

Hillel Neuer
JTA

Analysis

The favourite word of Navi Pillay, the UN high commissioner for human rights, appears to be "accountability." Yet, with her own agency tainted by its longtime disregard of Libyan human rights violations – and by apologists for Libyan strongman Moammar Gadhafi's occupying key UN positions – it's high time for the high commissioner to prove that accountability begins at home.

Let's put aside that in the past three years, United Nations headquarters in New York opened every golden door to the terrorist from Tripoli. Never mind that the Gadhafi regime was granted membership on the elite UN Security Council, that its envoy was made president of the UN General Assembly or that the dictator's daughter, Aisha, was named a UN "goodwill ambassador." Indeed, one wonders why Gadhafi bothered trying to pitch his Bedouin tent in the middle of Manhattan when UN headquarters itself was already in his hands.

Instead, let's look only at Pillay's own human rights apparatus in Geneva.

Start with the 47-nation UN Human Rights Council. Until the current atrocities in Libya, this august body – dominated by members like China, Cuba and Saudi Arabia – turned a blind eye to Libya.

Well, that's not entirely true. They once did look at Libya – when the Gadhafi regime won an election last May to become a member of the council – by a landslide.

UN Watch led an international coalition of human rights groups, supported by courageous victims of Gadhafi's torture and terror, to protest. Pillay, however, was silent.

Only last week did the council seek to undo its shameful act by suspending Libya's membership.

According to our recent study of Pillay's statements from 2008 to 2010, she never once mentioned human rights in Libya.

The recent annual report of her department, a Geneva staff of many hundreds, boasts of its ardent support for the Durban process, for which she served as secretary general of the 2009 review conference on racism.

When Najat Al-Hajjaji, a representative of the Libyan regime, was chosen to chair that conference's two-year planning committee, Pillay stood at her side and became the world's leading cheerleader for Durban II, the follow-up in Geneva to the 2001 anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, that devolved into an anti-Israel festival. Not a word about the brutal regime that stood behind the conference chair.

It gets worse. Al-Hajjaji is, in fact, still operating within Pillay's office. It turns out she is one of the UN Human Rights Council's investigators on human rights violations by mercenaries.

This is no joke: at a time when Gadhafi is using mercenaries to kill his own people, one of his longtime representatives is sitting on the world's highest human rights body as a supposed defender of human rights – and, of all things, as a defender of victims of mercenaries. Pillay, who worked closely with Al-Hajjaji on Durban II, is refusing to comment, according to Fox News.

Finally, there is the council's advisory committee. In 2008, ignoring the appeal of UN Watch and 25 human rights groups, the council elected Jean Ziegler, the co-founder of the Muammar Gaddafi Human Rights Prize – a propaganda tool for the regime – to the committee, and last year, he was made its vice-president. Pillay said nothing.

Recipients of the prize include former Cuban president Fidel Castro in 1998, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez in 2004, Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega in 2009 and Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan in 2010. In 2002, Ziegler won it himself, sharing the prize with Roger Garaudy, a convicted French Holocaust denier.

The sad reality is that Libya was given a free pass by the UN rights system. So were all of the other Middle East dictators. Instead, for the past five years of its existence, the council has pursued a pathological obsession with that region's only democracy, Israel.

Seventy per cent of all the council's condemnatory resolutions have been against Israel. Six out of 10 urgent sessions criticizing countries have been against Israel. The council has only one standing agenda item on a specific country: Israel.

Defenders of Pillay's department, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, insist she is independent of the 47-nation council and therefore not directly responsible for its actions. True enough.

Yet sadly, unlike UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and his predecessor Kofi Annan, who at various points criticized the council's anti-Israel selectivity and bias, Pillay has said nothing. On the contrary, on several occasions she has fully endorsed maintaining the special agenda item on Israel, saying it is justified because of "occupation."

When the Middle East was aflame three weeks ago, Pillay was there. Well, not in the human rights hot spots, such as Egypt, Bahrain or Libya. Instead, she was in Israel, accusing the Jewish state of "discrimination."

Until the United Nations' highest human rights officials exorcise their Israel obsession and fix their broken moral compass, murderers like Gadhafi will continue to enjoy impunity.

SPIRITUAL LEADER

Britain's historic Spanish & Portuguese Jews' Congregation (S&P) seeks an outstanding and visionary leader to spearhead our community's future development and growth, and to maximise our leadership potential within the Anglo-Jewish and international Sephardi world.

With a diverse portfolio of interests, the S&P comprises four unique and distinctive communities at Bevis Marks, Lauderdale Road, Wembley and Borehamwood, and the role will lead to involvement with the Sephardi Beth Din, Sephardi Kashrut Authority and Central London Mikveh.

The Spiritual Leader will also be expected to engage with related bodies such as the Montefiore Endowment kollel programme, Naima Jewish Primary School, Sephardi Centre and Rabbinic Conference, and will represent the S&P in its traditional role within Anglo-Jewry, by acting as joint Ecclesiastical Authority of the Board of Deputies, and through participation at ceremonial and civic occasions.

Given the challenging and prominent nature of the position, the successful candidate will therefore have demonstrated leadership in the promotion of inclusive, modern and orthodox values in both practical and academic terms.

Applicants will have had experience of developing communal or organisational strategies that stress a full spectrum engagement with members, while reaching beyond to inspire future growth. Exceptional interpersonal and organisational skills will be required, as well as the dynamism to engage with, inspire and guide those from a wide range of age groups and religious and social backgrounds. A willingness to absorb S&P minhag will be required, and familiarity with Sephardi traditions and practices would be advantageous.

Physician to be honoured for work on lupus

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Rheumatologist Murray Urowitz, who spearheaded the development of one of the largest and most respected lupus clinics and databank research programs in the world, will be honoured April 2 at the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto.

The event, called The Chrysalis Affair and organized by the Toronto General & Western Hospital Foundation, will celebrate Urowitz's contribution to lupus research and education over 40 years.

The lupus symbol is the butterfly. The chrysalis is a stage of development in the insect's metamorphosis into a butterfly – a work in progress.

The funds raised at the Chrysalis Affair will help establish the Murray B. Urowitz Fellowships in Lupus Research at the Toronto Western Hospital.

Lupus is an autoimmune disease that affects more than 50,000 Canadians and more than five million people worldwide, mainly women in their childbearing years.

One of the least known chronic autoimmune diseases, lupus is difficult to diagnose. It has a long list of symptoms resulting from chronic inflammation in different parts of the body, and patients can come in with one or a combination of symptoms.

Urowitz's parents, Sam and Bessie, emigrated from Poland in the early 1930s. He received his undergraduate degree at the University of Toronto, and completed his post-graduate education at both U of T and Johns Hopkins University in 1969.

On his return to Toronto, he worked at Wellesley Hospital, where he continued his research on lupus and became the chief of medicine.

He established the University of Toronto lupus clinic in 1970, and the Lupus Databank Research Program, now one of the largest such databanks in the world, in 1987.

The survival rate for lupus has increased greatly, as a result of his work and that of others. In 1974, the 15-year survival rate was 53 per cent. In 2010, the 20-year survival rate was 79 per cent.

When Urowitz attended medical school, he said in an interview, "there were zero classes in lupus. Now it's part of the curriculum."

Honey Agar, one of Urowitz's early lupus patients, said: "I met Murray officially in 1970 when I was dying in York Finch Hospital. He was a young doctor at Wellesley Hospital who had taken a strong interest in the little known disease called lupus.

"I spent seven years in and out of hospital being told I was crazy, hypochondriac – and I was dying."

Under Urowitz's care, Agar went into remission. In 1978, he helped her form a support group for patients, "as there was no information or help out there," she said.

Urowitz became the medical advisor of the newly formed Ontario Lupus Association (later Lupus Ontario). With the generosity of a major donor and other volunteers, many of them patients at the clinic, the databank was established.

With money raised by Lupus Ontario, a training program headed by Urowitz was established for young doctors who wanted to specialize in lupus disease.

In 1995, when Wellesley Hospital closed, Urowitz moved to Toronto Western Hospital, where he was asked to help develop a rheumatology division and to establish his lupus program.

After knowing Urowitz for 40 years, Agar said, "we are seeing both our dreams come true. He is an excellent teacher, probably the most forward-looking doctor I have ever met.

"He is well-loved by his patients, admired and respected by his residents, and not only myself, but thousands of other people all over the world owe Murray their lives. We, the lupus community, will forever thank him."

Interviewed in his office at Western Hospital, Urowitz, a professor of medicine at U of T, has numerous awards on his shelf including the Evelyn Hess Award for Outstanding Contribution to Lupus in 2009 by the Lupus Foundation of America, the Outstanding Clinical Teacher Award, which he won eight times, and he was the recipient of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada's 2004 Duncan-Graham Award.

His interests go far beyond his medical achievements. Among his list of communal activities, he served as president of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, chair of the board of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, chair of the board of United Synagogue Day School (now Robbins Hebrew Academy) and a member of the board of Jewish education.

He travels internationally to speak on lupus and is a consultant for Israeli pharmaceutical companies that are developing treatments for patients with lupus.

Murray Urowitz

Urowitz speaks with pride of his three daughters, Anna Urowitz-Freudenstein, a teacher at TanenbaumÇHAT, Sara, a research scientist at Princess Margaret Hospital, and Rachel, also a teacher at Tanenbaum CHAT, as well as his eight grandchildren.

Married to his wife, Judi, for 47 years, whom he met at Camp Massad as a teenager, Urowitz says, "It was love at first sight. We got married when I was an intern and it has been spectacular all the time."

Urowitz said he is excited about his work, citing, "my interaction with patients, research that allows me to be involved in the creation of new knowledge and the interaction in teaching young physicians on their way to practising rheumatology in general and lupus specifically."

He describes himself as "outwardly relaxed but inwardly driven."

For more information on the Chrysalis Affair or to purchase tickets, contact Amber Bernard at 416-340-4800, ext. 6279, visit www.chrysalisaffair.ca. For information about Lupus Ontario, go to www.lupusontario.org.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Canadian investors get access to Israeli mutual funds

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canada is widely acknowledged as having weathered the 2008-09 global economic recession better than most developed nations, but it doesn't hold a candle to Israel's performance.

In 2008, the first full year of the downturn, Canada's gross domestic product (GDP) struggled but grew at a rate of 0.5 per cent. Israel's economy increased by 2.8 per cent.

Through 2009, as the global financial crisis continued, Israel's economy grew by .8 per cent, while Canada's shrank by 2.5 per cent. At the same time, U.S. GDP contracted by 2.6 per cent, while the economies of Britain, Germany, France and Denmark all showed negative growth by even greater amounts.

In 2010, the results for Israel were even better: in the fourth quarter it led the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development with annualized growth of 7.8 per cent, and that followed five per cent annualized growth in the first half of the year. The good times were reflected in the price of Israeli stocks. In the four years before March 31, 2010, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange returned 27.1 per cent, compared to the Toronto Stock Exchange's 0.1 per cent and the S&P 500's -9.5 per cent.

Not bad for a country whose international image seems to be stuck on conflict and even more conflict. Many investors still don't have Israel on their radar – although in recent years more and more attention has been paid to "startup nation" and its commercially successful innovations in high tech.

Last June, Bond Street Mercantile, a boutique investment house in the Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue area in Toronto, began to offer its clients access to the red hot Israeli economy through the Holy Land Investment Fund (HLIF), which possesses exclusive Canadian rights to Halman-Aldubi Mutual Funds (HAMF).

Last week, the two founding partners of the Halman-Aldubi Group, one of Israel's largest investment funds with more than $2.5 billion under management, were in Toronto to meet high-worth investors and discuss opportunities in Israel.

Around 50 people attended the event at the Village Shul, where they heard the remarkable story of Israel's economic achievement. Earlier, Uri Aldubi and Rony Halman, along with Zale Newman, president of Bond Street, met with a small group of reporters and emphasized the sunny prospects for the Israeli mutual funds they manage.

Highlighting the discussion was a focus on vast underwater natural gas reserves discovered in recent years in the Mediterranean off the coast of Israel.

The find promises to be a real game changer for Israel and the rest of the western world, said Newman.

"The findings are considered the biggest in the last 10 years, maybe the last generation," said Halman, who heads a team that manages the firm's investments. The U.S. Geological Survey believes they hold 122 trillion cubic feet of natural gas – more than do all the United States' known reserves.

What's more, he continued, the Israeli fields are relatively easy to exploit. One field, Tamar, will need only three holes to supply all of Israel's needs for a generation, he said.

But that is only the first step in a remarkable economic performance that, as the International Monetary Fund reported in January, allowed Israel to weather the global recessionary storm while still registering modest growth.

Israel is gearing up to turn the oil and gas fields into long-term trade assets. As exploration companies drill, they are creating the infrastructure needed to meet the demands of European and even Asian customers, Halman said.

It's expected that as they are developed, the various gas fields that lie in Israel's economic zone will go from providing all of the country's domestic needs, beginning in 2013, to supplying European nations as well.

Rony Halman, left, and Uri Aldubi met with Toronto investors to discuss opportunities in Israel.

The benefits to the Europeans are clear, said Halman. Israel can provide an assured supply free of the turmoil and political manipulations of current suppliers.

Events in the Middle East clearly demonstrate that concerns over Israeli political and security instability were misplaced. It is the Arab world that is unstable and which threatens the supply of fossil fuel, said Aldubi.

"Vis-a-vis Israel, Europe is not pro-Israel," he said. "One of the reasons is that they need Arab oil and 100 per cent of their gas comes from Russia."

European consumers of Russian natural gas and of Middle Eastern fuel will turn to Israel in the future for an assured supply, they asserted. (Russia notoriously used its supply of gas for political leverage over one-time Soviet republics, which in 2009 had the effect of cutting supplies to western European consumers.)

"The possibility of getting gas from Israel is in the air," said Aldubi.

Even more, pipelines from Ashkelon, a port city on the Mediterranean, will carry the gas and oil south to Eilat, where they can be transported to markets in Asia, added Halman.

Newman said Bond Mercantile will offer its clients access to seven Halman-Aldubi funds, "with good Canadian flavour."

The funds specialize in oil and gas, real estate – which is booming in Israel – and financial services, as well as corporate and government bonds and fixed income funds.

HAMF, which is 50 per cent owned by Canadian and American investors, has had a stellar record of returns, said Halman. "Year after year, we're among the best three in Israeli mutual funds, among 1,200."

"Meaning we didn't choose them because of their good looks," added Newman. "This will change everything you know about Israel."

Among the six funds being touted by Newman were the Opportunities Fund, which returned 244 per cent in 2009; the real estate fund, which gained 162 per cent that year; and corporate bonds, which advanced 123 per cent. Bond's Holy Land Investment Fund has chosen to invest in six HAMF funds: the Opportunities and Real Estate funds; three Israeli bond funds and one fixed income fund, giving a Canadian investor a balanced portfolio of Israeli investments, said Newman.

STUDIO 180 TO PRESENT 'OUR CLASS' AT BERKELEY STREET THEATRE

Warsaw resident Tadeusz Slobodzianek's play Nasza Klasa (Our Class), which won a 100,000-zloty ($34,000) Nike Award last year as the best Polish literary achievement of 2010, is being mounted at Toronto's Berkeley Street Theatre in Ryan Craig's English version, as recently performed in London, England. Joel Greenberg, one of the five founders of Studio 180, is directing.

Our Class opens on a group of Jewish and Catholic schoolchildren in Poland in 1925 as they declare their various ambitions: to be a fireman, a film star, a doctor. The play follows the fortunes of 10 one-time classmates as their country is torn apart by invading armies. As nationalistic tensions and internal grievances escalate in violence, these people carry out an extraordinary and monstrous act.

$43, $45, $49. 26 Berkeley St., April 4 to 30. 416-368-3110, www.studio180theatre. Save 20 per cent by booking before March 28 using the code ST180.

Names in the News II: Jac Holzman, former record company founder and presently an adviser to Edgar Bronfman Jr. of the Warner Music Group, is being inducted this week into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in Cleveland. The 79-year-old Holzman founded Elektra Records in 1950, recording such artists as Theodore Bikel, Phil Ochs, Judy Collins, the Butterfield Blues Band, the Doors and Queen.

Holzman told the New York Times in a recent profile that his company, by remaining small, was able to beat out the larger record companies when it came time to sign up talent. "The reason indies beat majors as a rule is that the people who own these companies can make decisions and move," he said. "I can tell you story after story about hearing something and making the deal that day, while it took Columbia six weeks to process the demo and decide they wanted the band. Hey, too bad. They're in the studio for Elektra."

Cantor celebrates 10 years at Beth Sholom

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Cantor Eric Moses is celebrating 10 years as cantor at Beth Sholom Synagogue, with a concert on April 5 featuring Joshua Nelson, an African-American Jewish entertainer.

Moses will also be joined by his brother Alex,and Cantor Gideon Zelermyer and Stephen Glass of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal.

For the first time in public in 20 years, Moses plans on playing classical piano on a full-size grand.

"My mother was a teacher at the Western Ontario Conservatory of Music and I played all through my childhood. I've been practising and practising for this concert."

He called Nelson, whose singing is a distinctive combination of traditional Jewish and gospel music, "electrifying."

Moses, 40, who is married and has three young children, said he is grateful to be a cantor. "In life, we all have certain gifts, but we're not given the opportunity to share them. I'm fortunate in that category."

Born in Sudbury, Ont., – his family left when he was 13 – Judaism became very important to him. "I think that my

Cantor Eric Moses

Jewish identity was strengthened as a young boy because when you don't have it around you, you crave it more. I always knew I was different from other kids, but I was proud of it. It forced me to ask more questions."

Actor brings Zero Mostel to life

Kathryn Kates
Special to the CJN

As a teenager in the 1960s, Jim Brochu went to see Broadway's A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum, starring Zero Mostel.

After the show, Brochu went backstage to meet his friend, actor David Burns. It was there that Mostel and Brochu's lives collided – literally – when Brochu turned a corner and slammed right into the larger-than-life actor.

Years later, Brochu, an actor, brings the iconic Jewish entertainer back to life – Mostel died in 1977 – in the Canadian première of the one-man show he wrote and stars in, Zero Hour.

The show, which won a 2010 New York Drama Desk Award for Best Solo Performance, is directed by Oscar-nominated actor Piper Laurie. Direct from Broadway, it runs in Toronto in March and April.

Brochu hadn't heard of Mostel before seeing Forum. "This man was brilliant," exclaims Brochu. "I was attending military school, so I had a uniform on. He looked me up and down and asked, 'Who are you, General Nuisance?'

"When I told him I came to see my friend Davie Burns, he said, 'You never come to see me,' so I asked, 'Can I?'

"He told me, 'You'd better, I expect it'... and off he went. So, whenever I went back to see Davie, I would see Zero first."

Brochu says that Mostel's mannerisms slowly seeped into him.

"I acted in high school and recently found my yearbook. It read, 'Jim Brochu is the Zero Mostel of LaSalle.' So, when I was 18 years old, I was being compared to him."

A reviewer of a show Brochu performed in, in 1970, wrote that if someone ever did the Zero Mostel story, Jim Brochu would be his choice for the lead.

"I was only 23 years old. Zero just had this influence over me, and I always thought that one day I would take it [the role] on," Brochu says.

The show opened in Los Angeles in 2006 and has since toured America. The play follows Mostel, a three-time Tony Award recipient and movie star, from his youth to his rise to stardom, including his time on Hollywood's blacklist during the 1950s. It is set in Mostel's painting studio on West 28th Street in New York. Mostel thought of himself as a painter first and foremost. Incidentally, Brochu also paints.

While Mostel was not observant, he was kind of a closet religious Jew, Brochu says. "His family disowned him when he married his Catholic actress wife, Kate. The couple didn't share a bedroom. Often his son would come home late at night and find his father's door slightly ajar and Mostel davening."

Although Brochu was born Catholic, he says that he was raised in the Jewish culture. His priest once told him that he was a Jew in his heart.

"I had always wanted to be a priest, until June 20, 1959, when my father took me to see his friend Ed Zimmerman's daughter in a play. Ed's daughter was Ethel Merman and the play was Gypsy.

"I met her after in the dark, empty theatre," says Brochu. "She asked what I was going to do when I grow up, and at that moment, the curtain went up... and I said, 'Miss Merman, I'm going to be an actor.' That day changed my life. It was two years after that, that I met Zero."

Brochu's theatre writing credits include Cookin' with Gus and the musical The Big Voice: God or Merman?, which he also starred in. He is currently writing a two-person play with himself as circus showman P.T. Barnum.

Jim Brochu as Zero Mostel at the Al Green Theatre

Brochu's television credits include All My Children, The Young and The Restless and Mary Hartman, Mary Hartman. His first appearance in a feature film was in The Gang That Couldn't Shoot Straight, opposite Robert DeNiro.

He also wrote the unauthorized biography Lucy in the Afternoon: An Intimate Memoir of Lucille Ball. Brochu and Ball spent a lot of time together near the end of her life.

The show Zero Hour, presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, runs March 26 to April 16 at the Al Green Theatre in Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. For tickets, call 416-924-6211 or visit www.stlc.com. Some of Mostel's drawings and paintings are on display in Jacobs Lounge at Miles Nadal JCC.

Joshua Nelson to perform at concert

A graduate of the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute under the direction of Naftali Herstik, chief cantor of the Jerusalem Great Synagogue, Moses first graduated with an MBA.

"I hadn't intended to be a full-time cantor [but when I thought about it], a cantor advised me to complete my degree. He said I'll sing better if I know I have a full education."

Among his most memorable performances, he said, are appearances on the Merav Michaeli television show in Israel, and a gala cantorial concert at the Kravis Center for the Performing Arts in Florida. He has produced two CDs and served as president of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim from 2006 to 2008.

He also produced tributes to Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum and the late Cantor David Bagley.

Being a cantor is a "24/7 thing. It's always with me. I admit I have been faced with stage fright, but I've tried to combat it. I've been performing since I was six years old, so I know that once you settle into a concert, the stage fright leaves. It's the anticipation that is sometimes difficult."

He feels privileged to work at Beth Sholom, he said. "I have a unique friendship with Rabbi Aaron Flanzreich, and it is a wonderful congregation. When my wife was ill, we had tremendous support from the congregation and the broader community."

In his 10 years at the synagogue, he said, he has taught some talented bar/bat mitzvah students, and four of them will be joining him on stage at the concert.

Moses performs with Joshua Nelson at Beth Sholom Synagogue on April 5. For tickets and information, call the synagogue at 416-783-6103.

THE STORY OF ISRAEL'S PRIME MINISTER GOLDA MEIR, IN A ONE-ACT, ONE-WOMAN TOUR DE FORCE PERFORMANCE

Canadian journalist finds a niche as a novelist

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Cynthia Holz has reached a place of her dreams.

"I've been waiting all my life for this moment," she said. "I'm free to pursue my writing, which is my passion."

A published novelist and short-story writer, Holz, at 60, is semi-retired and, finally, no longer in need of a fulltime job to support herself.

It took Holz, a former journalist and writing instructor, 30 years to get to this point.

A dual Canadian-American citizen with five novels and one collection of short stories to her credit, she began publishing non-fiction in literary journals in 1980.

Even after the publication of her first book, Home Again, in 1989, she had to scramble to make ends meet.

"Nothing in the arts in Canada is lucrative," she said in an interview at a midtown Toronto café, nursing a café latte." Canada is too small a market, though a few people make a living from it. I've told my students, 'Don't give up your day job.'"

Holz, whose latest novel, Benevolence, will be published on March 19, generally explores themes ranging from family and friendship to the burden of history.

As a younger writer, she focused on romantic love and relationships. Nowadays, she is much more interested in the exploration of goodness and kindness.

"I've expanded my interests, said Holz, whose first book was followed by Onlyville (1994), The Other Side (1997), Semi Detached (1999) and A Good Man (2003). "I'm interested in larger questions about the human condition," added Holz, whose next novel will be about death and dying.

Born and raised in New York City, she invariably constructs her novels around Jewish characters.

In Benevolence, which touches on altruism and forgiveness, the main character, Dr. Ben Wasserman, is an organ transplant psychiatrist.

In A Good Man and Semi Detached, which are respectively novels about loss and regret and the costs of freedom, the chief characters are Izzy Schneider, a Holocaust survivor, and Barbara and Elliot Rifkin, a couple who agree to lead quasi-separate lives.

Cynthia Holz

Onlyville, which explores love, loss and discovery, turns on Anna Berman, a woman trying to sort out her life after leaving her boyfriend and settling on a small island.

"My characters have a sensibility that's Jewish," explained Holz. "I don't make any bones about it, and that's that. It's a part of their identity."

She uses the same method for each book. Starting with an idea and then a cast of characters, Holz sets off on her journey. "I know where I want to go. The challenge, and the pleasure, is to fill in the middle."

Thanks to her training as a journalist, she spends as much as a year on research, stopping in mid-course if she encounters a gap in her knowledge.

She is a slow, meticulous writer. "I sweat over every sentence," said Holz, who writes about four hours a day. "It has to sound beautiful, sentence by sentence."

Always drawn to words, she studied English literature at New York University. After graduating with a BA degree, she landed an entry-level position at Business Week, a magazine she had never even heard of.

Working her way up the ladder, she was by turns an assistant editor, reporter and columnist. Promoted to Canadian correspondent in 1976, she travelled across the country in search of stories, meeting her husband, Bill Grouchy, a locomotive engineer from Newfoundland, on a trip.

Their only child, Paul, is a PhD student at the University of Toronto.

On the whole, she did not enjoy her beat. Covering a digital watch convention in Saskatchewan, for example, was not particularly satisfying.

"There was usually no room for self-expression in business journalism," she observed. "I wanted to write fiction passionately, so I decided to give it a go."

By any yardstick, her decision to leave Business Week after two years in Canada was a courageous one. "I gave up a steady job and an expense account." But she liked Toronto, her base, and could live cheaply here. "There was no turning back."

Holz had no trouble making the transition from journalism to fiction, and was soon publishing short stories in such periodicals as The Fiddlehead and Antigonish Review.

Since they paid a pittance, she worked in a second-hand bookshop and wrote freelance essays and book reviews for newspapers and magazines.

There were other gigs, too. For nearly 20 years, she taught creative writing at Ryerson, and in 1999, she was writer-in-residence at the Toronto Public Library. Throughout the years, she gave talks and readings all over the country.

"I was piecing together a living," recalled Holz, a member of PEN Canada and the Writers' Union of Canada.

She has no intention of ever returning to New York City. "I immediately loved Toronto. It was green and friendly, and Canada was a kinder, gentler society. This is my home."

Former Pink Floyd frontman joins Israel boycott movement

JTA

Former Pink Floyd bassist and songwriter Roger Waters has joined the campaign of Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions against Israel, and is urging other artists to do the same.

In a letter posted on the website of the Alternative Information Center, Waters said he would continue to wage a boycott campaign against Israel until it ends its occupation of the West Bank and dismantles the security fence, grants full equality to Arab citizens of Israel and allows all Palestinian refugees to return to their homes in Israel.

"Where governments refuse to act, people must, with whatever peaceful means are at their disposal," Waters, a co-founder of the Pink Floyd rock band, wrote in the letter dated Feb. 25.

"For me it means declaring my intention to stand in solidarity, not only with the people of Palestine, but also with the many thousands of Israelis who disagree with their government's racist and colonial policies, by joining a campaign of Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions against Israel.

"My conviction is born in the idea that all people deserve basic human rights. My position is not anti-semitic. This is not an attack on the people of Israel. This is, however, a plea to my colleagues in the music industry, and also to artists in other disciplines, to join this cultural boycott."

Waters last performed in Israel in 2006. After visiting Jerusalem and Bethlehem and viewing the security fence – on which he spray-painted "we don't need no thought control," a lyric from the Pink Floyd song Another Brick in the Wall – he cancelled his concert at a sports stadium in Tel Aviv and moved it to Neve Shalom, a village in which Jews and Arabs live together in a planned community.

Waters is reportedly planning to place an opinion piece about the ongoing problems in the Middle East in either the New York Times or Britain's Guardian newspapers, but he has pre-empted that by speaking to TV news network Al Jazeera.

Waters is presently beginning the European leg of his tour of The Wall album which played throughout North America last fall.

The Anti-Defamation League criticized some of the images he used in these shows , which juxtaposed the Star of David and dollar signs, which he later changed.

Other artists, including Elvis Costello and the Pixies, have cancelled concerts in Israel in recent months, citing political reasons.

Track and field star gets full biographical treatment

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Standing 5 feet 5 inches and weighing 110 pounds, Abel Kiviat was a force of nature.

One of the finest middle-distance runners in athletic history, he reached his prime prior to World War I, when, as a member of the U.S.A. track and field team, he won a silver medal in the summer Olympic Games in Stockholm in 1912.

A teammate of the legendary native American athlete Jim Thorpe, Kiviat faded from public view in the 1920s, only to reappear in a blaze of glory in the 1980s when a New York historian suggested he be honoured on his 90th birthday. Now a celebrity again, he was inducted into both the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame and the U.S. Track & Field Hall of Fame.

Alan S. Katchen, a historian, has resurrected his life and times in a workmanlike biography, Abel Kiviat: National Champion (Syracuse University Press).

Kiviat (1892-1991), a world record holder in the metric mile, was the oldest of seven children and the son of Polish immigrants from Bialostok who arrived in America in the last decade of the 19th century.

Being traditional Jews, Kiviat's parents, Morris and Zelda, never really understood his passion for sports, believing that athletics was for gentiles. They dropped their objection after he convinced them that track and field was not a contact sport.

Kiviat, who was born on New York's Lower East Side but grew up on Staten Island, became a champion athlete while attending high school. As Katchen suggests, he possessed the three qualities of an accomplished middle distance runner: toughness, talent and desire.

Dropping out of school, he joined the Irish Club, the dominant track team of the day, which covered all his expenses, provided him with a job and gave him wide publicity.

In a deliberate effort to reinvent himself as an all-American athlete, he changed his first name from Avraham to Abel. It appears that Kiviat's Jewish background made no difference to his Irish teammates. "In one sense, this was surprising," Katchen writes. "Antisemitic attitudes and behaviours were common among the New York Irish early in the century."

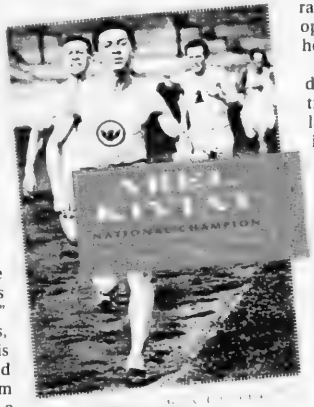
Kiviat's excellence as an athlete probably contributed to his acceptance. In 1911, he set a world record for the metric mile – 3:59.2 – and either held or shared world indoor records for the 600-, 880- and 1,000-yard events.

At the Olympic trials, he had no trouble securing a place on the U.S. team. In Stockholm, Kiviat was the favourite in the 1,500 metres. He led until the last eight metres, but was edged out by Arnold Jackson of Britain in a photo finish. He would describe his second-place finish as a great disappointment.

Shortly afterward, in Montreal, he smashed the Canadian mile record, one of Canada's oldest, and went on to launch what Katchen calls "the most productive stretch of his career."

Apart from running the fastest 440 yards of his career, 50.6, he broke the world record in a three-quarter mile handicap event and held world indoor records in five events – 600 yards, 1,000 yards, 1,320 yards, the mile and 1.5 miles.

Yet Kiviat's star status did not shield him from antisemitism. In 1913, while getting off a Staten Island trolley near his home, he was assaulted by several hooligans with baseball bats. His younger brother, Harold, says he was targeted by antisemites who resented Kiviat's acclaim.



Two years later, the Amateur Athletic Union, the governing body of sports in the United States, suspended Kiviat for having demanded "appearance money" at an event in upper New York state. He was thus barred from all competitions, a bitter blow and a disgrace.

In the face of his denials, he was reinstated. He remained silent about this "black mark on my heart" for the next seven decades, but toward the end of his life, he reluctantly admitted he had accepted a small sum of money, $25 or $35, for a race he had won.

Rejecting tempting offers to turn professional, Kiviat enlisted in the U.S. army in 1917, and was sent to fight in World War I in France. One night, it was his turn to drive an ammunition truck to the front. A fellow soldier who switched places with him was killed by a direct hit.

After being demobilized, his wife, having had an affair with a successful physician, demanded a divorce. Cast adrift, he went to live with his parents.

He returned to track and field and ran for a few more years, but not at his optimum level. In his last race, in 1924, he withdrew after stumbling.

Katchen says he lived "a lonely and desperate existence" after leaving track and field. Unemployed, he finally landed a job as a bond salesman at an investment banking firm, which usually reserved its positions for non-Jews. In the wake of the 1929 stock market crash, Kiviat found a job as a recreation supervisor. Subsequently, he was a salesman at a car dealership. From 1944 onward, he was a deputy federal court clerk.

He always maintained a foot in sports, sitting on the governing board of the second Maccabiah Games and serving as a press-box steward at Madison Square Garden and Penn Relays track meets.

In 1984, when the summer Olympics were held in Los Angeles, he was asked to carry the Olympic torch. When he was 98, he won the 100-metre race in New Jersey's Senior Games. Approaching his 100th birthday, he was spry and alert, a trooper till the end, Katchen suggests.

Hockey playing brothers are friendly rivals

• Paul Lungen
• Staff Reporter

It's nice to see a sibling rivalry continue even when the brothers are grown up and on their own.

Adam and Bryan Weinberg are hockey-playing brothers, aged 27 and 20 respectively, who play at fairly high levels – Adam was an accomplished junior player who got an offer to play for a NCAA Division 3 school; Bryan is currently in the lineup of the Vaughan Vipers of the Ontario Junior Hockey League (OJHL).

A third brother, Jordan, 25, likewise played Tier II junior hockey, with North York Rangers and Ajax Axemen, while a fourth brother, Steven, plays recreational hockey.

Adam acknowledged a rivalry with Jordan, even though they were actually on the same team for one year in Ajax when they were 20 and 18 years of age, respectively. "Me and Jordan played a year together in junior and that was pretty cool," said Adam. "We were competitive in everything, so it was really fun to play with him."

Bryan witnessed up close that desire for one-upmanship, and perhaps some rubbed off on him. When his two older brothers ended their junior careers, "they helped me with tips," he said, "but whenever I'm doing well, they say the game has changed and if they were playing, they'd be better.

"Everybody wants to be top dog. But they're washed up, so they're kind of reliving their playing days when they talk about their stats."

Okay, a sports reporter who has two young sons who like nothing better than to fight over everything, can play along: "Who's the best player?" Bryan is asked.

"Now, I am. I can play more than a couple of minutes without getting tired."

Ka-ching.

But if you were all in peak condition?

"It's unclear," he said. "We're all a little different in playing style. It's a team game."

Jordan, Bryan and Adam Weinberg hold the Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championship trophy they won as part of the Israeli Stars of David.

Finally, a compliment – sort of.

Adam, who works as a chiropractor, puts it this way. "We're supportive of each other, but we're pretty competitive."

You get the impression there might have been some elbowing at the dinner table when it came time to pass the mashed potatoes. But now, at least once a year, the brothers can put aside their differences and pull together on the same team. All three suited up for the Israeli Stars of David in the annual Canadian Multicultural Hockey Championships, held during the mid-winter break. The event brings together ethnic teams from around the GTA. The Stars of David distinguished themselves last December by winning a gold medal in the elite division. All three Weinbergs were part of the team, though they didn't play on the same line. It was the second time in three years the Stars of David finished first.

"The Stars of Israel is one of the rare occasions when we can play competitive hockey together," said Adam. "It's pretty neat playing together."

Adam evaluates the boys' hockey skills like this: Jordan, a rearguard, "is very good defensively. Bryan is more like a hard worker, a hard skater who likes to grind it out. I'm the offensive guy, the sniper who puts the puck in the net and sets up plays."

Adam, who skates twice a week in men's league at York University, said he's played for the Stars of David for the past four years. When he attended his first tournament, he recognized a lot of the guys on other teams and knew they were good players. "The Jewish guys were not supposed to be good at sports, especially hockey. I was pleased to see how many good players there were. I saw the team play and said, 'yeah, we're going to do alright'."

Three years ago, when they won their first title, "We turned some heads when we started doing well. They didn't think we could do so well. It even turned my head," he said.

The 2010 team was the best so far, said Adam, who along with Jordan served as an alternate captain. "It was the fastest team that was there and we had lots of talent."

Typically for quality hockey players, the boys got an early start in the sport. Adam said his mother enrolled him in skating lessons when he was five years old and the boys played house league for many years.

Bryan recalled playing with his dad, Jeffrey, and brothers on Lake Muskoka near the family cottage. "He plays shinny with friends and he gets us to play with them to show us off."

With the OJHL regular season over, Bryan now is in playoff mode. He had requested a trade from Mississauga Chargers to go to a team involved in the post season. The Vipers eliminated North York in the first playoff round and then tackled Kingston Voyageurs in the seven-game Southeast Conference semi-finals. They trailed the "Vees" 2-0 early in the series.

As for Adam, he recently got married and began work as a chiropractor. Jordan too is slated to be married soon. That has pretty much spelled an end to their competitive hockey careers.

"We'd have loved to go to Europe and play professionally for a time," said Adam. "If I was single, I'd probably be in Europe.

"But, I stopped on my own terms to go to chiropractic school. The dream is over."

Canadians help launch Israel art web portal

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Three young Canadian Jewish women have helped to launch a new web portal – Omanoot.com – an English-language site showcasing Israeli arts.

Quite possibly the first site of its kind, it encompasses all the arts of an entire country, including film, music, literature and visual art. Omanoot.com – "omanoot" means "art" in Hebrew – aims to paint a picture of Israel that fewer people see and give them a different sort of opportunity to connect to the country.

"Everybody knows about Israeli technology and startups, but the same creative energy is pouring into the arts," says Omanoot.com founder Edoe Cohen, 32. "We want to bring that energy to the world. Why do people fall in love with Israel? It's not the politics. It's the culture and the vibrancy, and the creative energy of our society."

Cohen, who moved to Israel from the United States when he was 15 years old, arrived at the idea for Omanoot.com when he was a student of political science and modern Jewish studies at Columbia University in New York. It was just after the second intifadah, and sentiment on campus was vehemently anti-Israel.

"I realized very quickly that the way to make people feel connected to Israel was not through 'talking heads,' but through cultural diplomacy," says Cohen, who was instrumental in bringing Israeli bands and other artists to campus.

"People connect to the culture, the people, the energy [of the country]. I saw first-hand the power of the arts to bring people together and connect them to Israel."

Cohen, who is enrolled in the Kellogg-Recanati International Executive MBA program at Tel Aviv University, commenced work on the site in 2007, after receiving startup funds from several philanthropic sources, among them the ROI Community of Young Jewish Innovators, a worldwide network of young social entrepreneurs.

ROI also helped connect Cohen to the Career Israel program, where he found the interns he needed to make the site a reality. Among the 20 members of his all-volunteer staff from North America, the United Kingdom, France and Israel are Canadians Alix Billinkoff, Romy Poletti and Orli Kessel.

Billinkoff, 23, from Winnipeg, works as Omanoot's webmaster. She joined the project five months ago, when she arrived in Tel Aviv as part of a long-term Israel experience program. "[Working for the site] has been a great introduction to Israeli culture," says Billinkoff, who was familiar with a few very popular Israeli music groups before she started at Omanoot, but has since been exposed to all sorts of Israeli art scenes.

"The site is amazing," says Billinkoff, a business graduate from the University of Manitoba. "It gives Canadians access to Israeli art that is otherwise almost impossible to get in Canada. The site makes it possible to experience Israel from the comfort of home and stay connected with Israel after you visit and return home."

Until Omanoot.com, says Poletti, 27, from London, Ont., most people's impression of Israeli art was restricted to their parents' dusty Judaica collections from the 1970s and '80s. Omanoot gives a thus-far non-existent window into a living, breathing, thriving, multi-faceted contemporary Israeli art scene.

"There is nothing else like [Omanoot] that speaks to young people, and I think it's really important – this is a really great way to show that there are amazing dynamic things happening in Israel," says Poletti, who came to Israel for the first time with Birthright Israel in July.

She intended to return to Israel for one month after the trip, but has stayed on for the last four months and counting. "I absolutely love it here," says the McGill University graduate of art history and communications.

Poletti is working on Omanoot's marketing strategy, which in its first phase aims to connect the Diaspora to Israel and strengthen that connection and, in its second phase, intends to connect all people to Israel.

"Who knows that street art in Tel Aviv is among the top scenes in the world? This is not something that's known in a synagogue in Toronto. They aren't talking about that in Sunday school class," says Poletti. "But it goes beyond that. [Omanoot] is not only a way to speak to the Diaspora, but to the world, globally. That's my dream."

After five months in Tel Aviv, gathering content, in the form of artist biographies and art profiles for Omanoot, Kessel, 24, returned to her native Ottawa in June, where she works in human resources for Canadian Citizenship and Immigration. She still writes and edits for Omanoot.

"It's wonderful to be able to stay involved in Omanoot. It's a very powerful way of speaking about Israel. The site gives valuable insight into the beauty and joy of Israel, and also the difficulties and uncertainties," says Kessel, a graduate of Queen's University with a degree in finance.

Her one-on-one work with Israeli artists provided a window into the country's "artistic psyche," she says. "There is so much more going on than what people living outside of Israel, who have never been to Israel, can ever imagine. There is such a vast cultural richness to the art that comes out of Israel, and the drive that artists have to create, to be seen and heard, is nothing short of incredible."

Although the site intends to show a side of Israel "beyond the conflict," a lot of Israeli art takes this subject head-on. "Their [the artists'] work sometimes expresses things that can't be explained in words, like what it's like to live in instability," says Kessel.

Omanoot doesn't shy away from political content. "We're committed to featuring artists of every ethnicity and religion," says Cohen. "Nor will we shy away from art that might be critical of Israel. That's part of being a thriving democracy."

Currently, the site's film channel has the most content, including artist profiles, interviews, photos and clips. Visitors can also purchase films on the site. Eventually, Cohen hopes to offer full-length features, streamed directly from the site. He says the remaining channels – visual arts, music, and literature – will be filled with content by the summer. "The minute we finish the sections, we will add more content and more functions to the site."

It will take time, but Omanoot aims to post profiles not just on mainstream artists who receive a lot of media coverage, but also on independent artists and student artists, to give a feel for the ever-changing and developing artistic innovation taking place on the ground.

"The collection is very eclectic," says Cohen. "A visitor might come to the site because he likes [the band] Hadag Nahash, but once he's here will discover many other Israeli hip-hop musicians."

In addition to the raw content the site makes available to users, it also features lesson plans, meant for schools.

"Omanoot.com delivers the beautiful Israel to Israelis and to Jews and non-Jews everywhere," says Justin Korda, director of ROI. "We are especially proud that ROIers on both sides of the Atlantic have teamed up under Edoe's visionary leadership to showcase Israel's multi-faceted art scene."

Web TV hosts hangs out with Canadian Jews in L.A.

Jordan Press
Special to The CJN

Samantha Gutstadt learns something new about herself every day. The 30-year-old actor, producer and web TV host recently signed up for Google alerts about herself.

A note lands in her inbox any time her name pops up online, such as recently when her name appeared on a website dedicated to celebrity dating gossip.

"Dating? I'm married," Gutstadt says with a laugh.

She laughs again talking about the alert that told her some random person on the Internet Movie Database added her to a list of the hottest Canadian women in Hollywood.

It has been about four years since Gutstadt moved to California to make it big as an actress, but a funny thing happened along the way: Gutstadt, a Toronto native, has made a name for herself as a web TV host on This Week in Fashion and on the website RealTVFilms, for which she covers film festivals worldwide.

"I think sometimes our paths and careers come by accident. I came out here wanting to act. I started booking hosting work... It started as a way to make money and not bartend," Gutstadt says on the phone from California.

Now, Gutstadt sees herself hosting for years to come, producing more films and continuing with her acting and modelling career. And she'll do it all her way, an extension of her fashion sense that can only be called the Samantha Style.

As an eight-year-old, Gutstadt would lay out her clothes for school. Not once would she don a dress, not even for picture day at Leo Baeck Day School. She couldn't be like any other little girl at school — she had to be Sam G.

Today, the Samantha Style might be a dress with a tie, or a cuffed suit with studs. There's a sense of old and new that gives you an insight into her personality.

"Clothes are an expression of our personalities. Style is about who you are," Gutstadt says. "I'm a bit of classic... with a bit of edge."

It was the Samantha Style that drove her to California in 2007. If she was going to make it as an actress, she felt she had to be in Hollywood to make her dreams come true. It was a decision she made despite knowing what accompanies such a dramatic move: Jewish guilt.

"You have no idea. We did something weird. We moved to L.A.," Gutstadt says, referring to her husband of more than four years, Ron Nayot. Gutstadt jokes that her parents were concerned that once in California, Gutstadt would end up hanging out with Lindsay Lohan and turning into a Charlie Sheen "winner."

"None of that happened... We literally moved out here to hang out with Canadian Jews," Gutstadt says with a laugh. "Anyone who is Canadian and Jewish in L.A., I know.

"Here, you meet one person and then you meet everyone. I never appreciated the global community of Jews."

Understanding Gutstadt begins with understanding her parents. Her father, Eli, is a lawyer who was born Germany and grew up in New York and Toronto. Today, he lives on a farm in Caledon, Ont., retraining retired racehorses.

Gutstadt's mother, Janice, introduced her daughter to the arts, relying on her background in dancing from York University, her career as an English as a second language (ESL) teacher and love of writing. And they played tennis, which Gutstadt excelled at as a child and continues playing to this day.

"My whole childhood was being part of the Richmond Hill Country Club," she says. "I was part of a non-Jewish tennis sporting world, and Leo Baeck."

Today, Gutstadt is very much a part of the show-business world, landing commercials, acting roles and hosting gigs — Gutstadt is the Tampax Pearl girl with the dress problem and the one destroying the silence in the Hearing Foundation of Canada's mellow yoga class.

She has also attracted attention for her work as a producer on her dark comedy short, Shiva, which airs on Bravo TV in Canada in April.

Shiva is the story of a woman who goes to shivahs in search of true love in the arms of widowed husbands. The idea for the short came from her step-grandfather. He told her that an unknown woman showed up to a shivah with a casserole in a bid to woo the recently widowed husband, in this case Gutstadt's step-grandfather.

"It was sad because she was also widowed," Gutstadt says. "He didn't even really know her. She was literally crashing the shivah, and she was trying to get him to take her out on a date. Apparently, she did it to other men, too.

"Of course, there's comedy in there, but there's also a darkness."

Despite leaving the comfort of her hometown of Toronto for Los Angeles, Gutstadt says she feels more connected spiritually with her Judaism, leaning on it as part of the personal growth someone goes through when they become a stranger in a strange land.

She said she's organized Passover seders with her friends for the past two years. "It's special," she says.

The late actor Corey Haim was invited to last year's seder. Gutstadt got to know the Toronto native during her time in California, inviting him over years earlier during Chanukah. They grew closer during their time spent together on the set of the 2009 feature Shark City. Gutstadt text-messaged Haim with the Passover invitation the night he died.

"I woke up Thursday hearing the news that he died," Gutstadt says, becoming quiet. She wonders if he got her message. Her humbling silence reveals the soft side to Gutstadt's edge. It's that soft side that tugs at Gutstadt's heart and makes her believe that she may be back in Toronto one day.

"Right now, I'm undecided. It's going to be L.A. or Toronto. Until we have kids, we're going to be here," she says. "I want to get to a certain place with work, but having a kid in L.A. without your family around and when you're not settled with work seems horrifying to me," she says. Los Angeles, she adds, is "a tough place to have a traditional anything because it's not a traditional place. It creates challenges."

Talk long enough with Gutstadt and you get the impression that she can handle any challenges California can throw her way. Her diversified career portfolio might leave a lesser person exhausted, but Gutstadt thrives on it.

"I don't know if it comes from my parents, but I just love it. I wake up and make a list about what I have to do today," she says. "I have that fire in me. No one needs to push me."

That's the Samantha Style.

Energy conservation in Israel

I was recently in Israel representing a company I am on contract with and to speak at a renewable energy conference in Eilat, co-sponsored by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

I was part of a delegation put together by Canada's National Research Council. I wanted to understand the current Israeli state of mind with respect to energy conservation and advances in renewable energy. At the same time, I was tasked to determine if there was an opportunity to expand distribution of my client's energy consumption benchmarking software to Israel.

Having received no pre-briefing from the Canadian Embassy, I started to assemble my own comparative study between the situation in Ontario/Canada and that of Israel.

Sustainable Jew

Fred Winegust

Some of the factors I used in the comparison included looking at carbon inventories of both countries, electricity generation capacity and consumption patterns between residential, commercial, institutional and industrial users in order to establish a numerical baseline.

It was also important to develop a clear understanding of which Israeli government ministries had control of the various programs that would give various stakeholders the incentive to either conserve energy or provide additional energy to the Israeli power grid from renewable sources.

To get some cultural grounding, I pretended to be a new immigrant. I used that perspective to gain an understanding of how the relationship between the customer and the utilities that provide electricity and water worked.

I also looked for school-based programs in Israel similar to the Ontario EcoSchools program, which would teach students about environmental issues and allow them to select activities to implement at school in order to learn by experience.

When looking at Israeli schools, it was important to establish whether the people responsible for school-building operations were already measuring the energy consumption of each school and had the ability and financial support needed to execute energy conservation and/or renewable energy generation measures.

What was also critical was whether school operations had found a way to connect their actions to relevant parts of the school curriculum. Was there a way to show students not only what was done, but also how the science behind the conservation effort worked? Were there lessons available to explain the economics behind the decision to implement the solution? Was there a clear connection made to help students understand how the school's actions would have an impact on the overall goal for energy conservation and renewable energy generation in Israel? Would students be inspired to come up with additional ideas and would the operations side be in a position to implement them?

However, what struck me most was the grassroots effort in Israel to deal with these opportunities. Many NGOs were spending more time soliciting sponsorship, as opposed to executing an organized plan to collaboratively bring their individual strengths together with the objective of inspiring measurable behavioural change in Israeli society around environmental impact.

PASSOVER CHOCOLATE TORTE

1 c slivered almonds, toasted
1 tbls + 1 c sugar, divided
1 1/2 sticks butter
1/2 c Cocoa
5 eggs, separated
1/8 tsp salt

CHOCOLATE SAUCE
1/3 c brown sugar
2 tbls cocoa
1 tsp potato starch
3/4 c evaporated milk
1/2 stick butter

Heat oven to 375°. Grease bottom of 9" springform pan. Place almonds in food processor with 1 tbls sugar; process until finely ground. Set aside. In small saucepan, melt butter; stir cocoa into cooled butter.
Beat egg yolks with 3/4 c sugar in large bowl. Add chocolate mixture, salt, almonds. Beat egg whites until foamy. Gradually add remaining 1/4 c sugar, beating until stiff. Add about 1/4 beaten egg whites to chocolate mixture; stir until well blended. Gradually fold in remaining egg whites. Pour into prepared pan. Bake 40-45 min. Cool 10 min in pan on wire rack. Unmold; carefully peel off foil. Cool completely. Serve with WARM CHOCOLATE SAUCE.
Chocolate Sauce: In small saucepan, stir together sugar, cocoa and potato starch. Gradually stir in evaporated milk. Cook over medium heat, stirring constantly, until mixture thickens. Add butter; stir until melted. Cool slightly. Pour over torte.

Hamotzi on melba toast

She tells me that when she walks out of the shower and stares at her face in the mirror, she's in disbelief. She says that somewhere, some time, 86 crept into her and took her history.

"It's gone," she blurted out.

I asked her to explain.

We sat together on a velvety French lounge in her living room surrounded by old smiles in splintered wooden frames.

"You are a young man," she said, "and can't imagine what lies ahead of you."

"If you're lucky, the angel of death will tap your shoulder while those whom you love are still alive. If you're not lucky, you'll live as if it was forever."

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

The phone didn't ring while we talked. Nobody knocked at the woman's old door. The TV channel she was watching was the one with the building security cameras. Who would enter? Who would leave? It was as if she was a protagonist in a chassidic tale – lonely, alone and deserted, except without the shack on the outskirts of the forest and a need for firewood.

We continued to talk. "I always believed you can judge a person by the number of toilet rolls in their cart," she giggled. "I can spot colitis from aisle 1."

"I live on my pension and am lucky if I can buy a challah for Shabbos at the end of the month. So sometimes I'll make Hamotzi on melba toast. Is that OK?"

I asked the elegant lady if anybody comes around, who the children are in the pictures, if she'd like the Internet.

She told me, most genuinely, that her children moved away many years before and her friends are dead. Sometimes her children and grandchildren call, but they offer up little of their lives, as if sitting mile-high in a treehouse.

"I seemed to have worn off after time," she said. "Nobody comes around," she added, "except for a Jewish child down the hall." The wise woman turned to me. "There seems to be nothing classic about my time. Or is it me?"

I asked her again if she'd like the Internet, a computer.

"What is it?" she asked.

I told her I could get her a computer and someone to teach her how to talk to people all over the world. "Maybe you could e-mail a man in Peru." She blushed but smiled cutely. "Me? This?"

"Sure I'd love that," she exclaimed. "But I need visitors too. I told you, you don't know what lies ahead of you. The worst of it is loneliness, so wide and shrill you can feel it and hear it. Death is likely friendlier, my dear."

"Give me a face. A heartbeat to equal mine. Let me feel a hand on mine. That is what I want. Please."

I gave her a kiss and promised I'd write about her and ask everyone to adopt a senior. She thanked me and handed me a present wrapped in a paper bag. "Sometimes I open the window just a crack, so I can hear the wind weep," she whispered.

I got home and unravelled the paper – it was the Sunday New York Times – and ribbons. In it was a picture. She was young, in a Renoiresque world where unattractiveness had no invitation, when history included her and she thought she knew what lay ahead.

Food for thought...

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

I had no idea that math education in elementary school was a subject people were passionate about. But when the subject kept coming up over breakfast following weekday morning services at my synagogue, I realized that a story idea had fallen into my lap.

I learned a few things writing it, too. Who knew that manipulating numbers can teach kids life lessons?

Yosef Tastassa also writes about life lessons (and academic ones) in this supplement, but his context is more exotic than the average classroom. Tastassa and his wife, Estelle, took their three children on a 10-month trip through Asia, Australia and New Zealand. His article offers a glimpse into what they all learned.

As well, we look at the issue of perfectionism, how families who don't send their children to day school can best impart Jewish education and identity, and what place hugging has – or doesn't have – at school.

Educator Dan Goldberg, who has a PhD in clinical psychology, reflects on an alternative approach to bullying that avoids common pitfalls; Sheri Shefa writes about how she and her husband decided on a daycare centre for their young son, and university student Rachel Miller shares her thoughts on her year in Israel.

The quest for perfection

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

When Barbara Albert, a teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools, assigned homework and then took up math problems with her Grade 5 students, she didn't think much of it. Until, that is, at meet-the-teacher night that same day, when a few parents told her their kids had used calculators to solve the math problems.

This experience left her wondering why kids are so afraid to make mistakes, and where the quest for perfection comes from.

"I don't know," she said, when asked that question. "Whether it comes from parents, whether it's a self-driven thing, I'm not sure. As Jewish parents, we definitely foster it, and then there's competition from each other. [Students] perceive that another person's doing something better than they are, and it pushes them to try to do better."

The issue of perfectionism has taken on greater prominence lately with the publishing of Amy Chua's book Battle Hymn of the Tiger Mother. In the book, Chua, who is Chinese and married to a Jewish man, discusses the strict way in which she raised her two daughters. Her methods included not letting them go to sleepovers, have play dates, be in a school play, watch TV or get a grade lower than an A. The book has spawned a number of articles and blog posts comparing Chinese and Jewish mothers.

Barbara Kay, a National Post columnist, talks about how her sister, who was a top student, would tell her parents she got 95 per cent on a test. However, that was not the highest mark in the class. While her parents were proud, Kay writes, they would have been even prouder if she had gotten the best mark in class.

"Ms. Chua's extreme methods actually are unnecessary, as the Jewish experience – high expectations, high sensitivity to children's… needs – proves."

While Albert has not read Battle Hymn of the Tiger Mother, she believes there are similarities between the Asian and Jewish communities in terms of striving for perfection.

"There's always this question that… we were the minority, and we had to show our mettle somehow. [Academics] were an easy way for us to shine."

A young university graduate, who asked that her name not be used, went to a Jewish high school for girls. She said that she did not feel pressured by her parents to do well in elementary school, but did in high school.

"I felt pressured in high school to get good grades, because everyone in my family went to University of Toronto, so I had to go there, too. And if I didn't get the grades to get in, [my parents said] I wouldn't get a good job and wouldn't get married."

"The day school system is a pressured system because no matter which day school it is, we're doing the curriculum in less time than the public school," Albert, who has been teaching at Associated for 28 years, said. "There's the pressure to get it done, the pressure to teach it and the pressure to learn it.

"The parents want their children to go to the best schools and be the best, because like any good parent, they want their child to do better than they did. There's got to be a balance, and that's where everything comes to a head. We want people to be happy, and to get the message across that just getting 100 per cent doesn't quite do it."

"It's not just the marks," she added. "Social skills are very important."

Parents admit to doing kids' homework

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

When Ziva Rotman wanted to make sure her students were doing the work she assigned, she stopped giving them homework.

Rotman, who taught grades 2 and 4 at Westminster Public School in Thornhill, Ont., from 1988 to 1995, and now teaches high school in Israel, says she stopped giving homework because "the kids didn't really do it, and if they did, it created a lot of… fights [at home]."

She also cites parents helping their kids with the work as another reason for cancelling homework. "I never did assign much homework anyway, and once I stopped I decided to continue, preferring to let them do the work… under my supervision."

A study conducted in 2008 for Ask Kids, a search engine through which students can research school topics, found that, of the 778 parent participants in the U.S. based survey, 43 per cent of the parents admitted to having done their kids' homework.

Brian H. was friends with someone in elementary school whose mom did her homework for her. This affected her negatively, he said – she had a "sense of entitlement" and didn't make it through university.

"When you have somebody that's over-excelling, [it made me] feel stupid around her," he said. Because her mom was so involved, Brian added, she was often one of the top students in class.

"She seemed almost too smart because her mom was doing the homework for her… [Her attitude was] that things should come to her easier.

"She is definitely a victim of her mom's meddling," he said, adding that she stopped talking to him, and all their mutual friends, in high school.

While parents doing homework for their children is not a good idea, Rotman says helping them out or even just supervising can be good for the students.

"I find that kids who do homework under parental supervision do a better job, and their parents feel they are part of their children's experience," she said.

"The problem is," she continued, "that parents can be quite competitive and want their children to look better than others and seem to do better in school… and so they would do their kids' work in order for the kid not to fail.

"Many parents used to do their children's science fair projects, and of course their projects looked a lot better than the ones done solely by the kids."

Options for Jewish education

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

How to impart a Jewish education to our children is a subject many Jewish families struggle with. Jewish day school education can be prohibitively expensive – for some, unjustifiably so. For those who choose public school for their children, there are still options when it comes to Jewish education. The question becomes which of those options to choose.

Which one gives the most bang for your buck? Do you opt for Jewish summer camps and religious after-school programs? Do you become more involved and active in Judaism at home and in the synagogue? Do you send the kids to Israel when they're young adults and hope that somehow they'll absorb what it is to be Jewish by osmosis in the Jewish state?

Seymour Epstein

Toronto writer and consultant Seymour Epstein – former UJA Federation of Greater Toronto senior vice-president for the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education – says that aside from Jewish day school, the "best combination possible" is a mix of Jewish educational summer camp and some kind of supplementary school.

"It's not going to give the child the kind of deep literacy you get from a day school education," he said, attributing the difference to the number of hours and the intensity of the day school program. "On the other hand, sometimes camp plus supplementary school score higher on [imbuing] Jewish identity than just a day school."

That is particularly true if the camp and supplementary school are geared to the family's lifestyle and denominational affiliation – like Reform Judaism or modern Orthodoxy, he said.

Start at home

Leora Isaacs, vice-president of programs and organizational learning at the Jewish Educational Service of North America (JESNA), says the value of Jewish life and tradition at home is incalculable. "If you're talking about fostering Jewish identity and connection to Jewish people and the community, the primary source of identity building is the family, hands down," she says. "Home, and the Jewish values you teach and model are primary. Everything else flows from that."

Steven M. Cohen, research professor of Jewish social policy at the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York, has done extensive research about the impact of various forms of childhood Jewish education on the Jewish identity of North American adults. In a 2004 report, he noted that the most consistent measures of influence were Jewish day schools, attending supplementary schools for seven years or more and travel to Israel.

"Jewish camping and youth group exert more modest but nonetheless across-the-board effects," he wrote. "Participation in all forms of informal Jewish education substantially elevates adult Jewish identity indicators, and the combination of youth groups, camping and Israel travel produces notable increases in all available indicators of Jewish identity."

Cohen added that in college, participation in Hillel and Jewish studies programs also tends to enhance Jewish identity.

Jewish Sunday school

The report noted that when Sunday schools are the only form of Jewish schooling, they perform weakly as an instrument for enhancing Jewish identity.

The reasons, Cohen suggests, could be deficiencies in basic structure, teachers, leadership, and/or curriculum. "Another possibility is that such schools tend to serve youngsters from families with relatively low levels of Jewish engagement, reinforcing their relative distance from conventional Jewish life," he writes.

Morton Weinfeld, a professor of sociology at McGill University, says most of the observations by American researchers would apply to Canada as well. "The Jewish day school norm is more common in Canada because there's more funding for it," he explains. "As a result, there's less urgency involved in making those other options more effective."

Jewish camp is 'a good springboard'

Jewish after-school programs have come a long way in the last decade, according to Isaacs. "JESNA has been rethinking what it means to provide really powerful part-time Jewish programs after school," she says. "We're doing experiments in various communities to come up with alternative models for Jewish education, using the arts, drama and music."

You can't underestimate the importance of complementary Jewish education, says Steven Kraus, education consultant at JESNA. "Jewish after-school programs remain the number 1 venue for children to receive a Jewish education in North America."

Ron Polster

Jewish overnight camps

Another form of complementary Jewish education is Jewish overnight camping.

Among its Jewish overnight camp incentive grant programs, the Harold Grinspoon Foundation recently initiated a North America-wide program to provide scholarships of up to $1,000 to first-time Jewish campers throughout the United States and Canada. Titled PJ Library Goes to Camp, its goal is to encourage Jewish children to attend those camps, which are seen as places of fun, friendship and profound Jewish influence.

In Canada, incentive and needs-based programs to get Jewish kids into Jewish camps are also in place. Ron Polster, director of Jewish identity programs at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said federation has spent $250 million per year for the past two years getting some 550 Jewish kids in Grades 2 through 7 into those camps through a program titled TopBunk. "The funds have been allocated by private donors in Toronto, by the UJA and by the Foundation for Jewish Camp," he says.

Of the children who received those incentive dollars to go to camp, the majority attended neither Jewish day school nor afternoon congregational school. But most of them returned to camp a second time, and later became involved in Jewish youth groups and Jewish Community Centre events. "They've become more engaged from a Jewish perspective," Polster says. "We're using Jewish camps as an outreach vehicle for those families. It's not a panacea, but as part of a repertoire of other identity building programs, it's a good springboard for future Jewish involvement."

TopBunk is an incentive program, not a needs-based program, he adds. "Another $500 million goes towards a needs-based subsidy program, some of which is used to send Jewish children in financial need to Jewish camps."

Statistics indicate that TopBunk and programs like that offered by the HGF are barking up the right tree. Jack Wertheimer, professor of American Jewish history at the Jewish Theological Seminary, published a study in September 2010 on how leaders in their 20s and 30s are reshaping North American Jewish life. In it, he notes that two-thirds of today's young Jewish leaders went to Jewish overnight camp.

Jewish teachers use common sense, not hugging bans

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

It's not uncommon to see elementary and high school students giddily embracing in the hallways between classes, but a number of school administrators in the United States have tried to put a stop to these public displays of affection with an outright ban on physical contact between students.

While the trend has not yet reached Canadian schools, institutions in California, Illinois, New York, Florida, Texas and even schools in England, have enforced rules banning any physical contact between students.

Earlier this year, a 17-year-old anonymous senior at a New England high school posted a petition on a parenting website called FreeRangeKids.com after the administration at her school implemented a touching ban.

"The only appropriate touch, we are told, is a handshake. Presumably, this is to thin out the kissing couples who clog up the halls," she wrote.

"Touch can be a powerful bonding mechanism between friends, and any rule that fails to differentiate between acts of sex and acts of friendship seems arbitrary and inherently draconian," she said, adding that students should not be taught to see all touch as inherently bad, rather they should learn what is and is not an appropriate public display of affection.

A middle school in Fairfax County, Va., has a no-touch policy that is so strict students are reprimanded for holding hands or high-fiving.

Meanwhile, here in the Greater Toronto Area, no such policies exist, even in Jewish private schools. And if they do, they are not enforced.

Benjamin Cohen, Bialik Hebrew Day School's principal of general studies, said his school doesn't have a hugging policy.

"It's really not been an issue here. It really is a non-topic here," Cohen said.

He said he assumed it is more of an issue at public high schools.

"If it were an issue, we might have to develop a policy, but it's not and it's just not on our radar."

Eric Petersiel, Leo Baeck Day School's head of school, said his school also doesn't have an official hugging policy, but acknowledged that students, especially female students, tend to be very affectionate with one another.

Sometimes, if he feels that students are taking things too far, he'll intervene.

"Certainly, when I see girls walking down the halls who have an extremely physical relationship, and that is very common, I ask them to keep their hands to themselves," Petersiel said.

"I do think there is a point at which it moves from a positive required demonstration of warmth into something a little different and we do try to discourage it."

He said that his concern with physical contact between the students at his school – which goes up to Grade 8 – has less to do with sexuality and more do to with how the kids socialize.

"I get more concerned about what it does to the social impact of the group. It becomes an issue of who's cool, who's popular and who's my really good friend, versus the kids who aren't a part of that," Petersiel explained.

"The cool girls who hold hands walking down the hall becomes an exclusion of the girls who aren't participating."

Hugging is a 'more sensitive' issue for male teachers

Isaac Oziel, a grades 6 and 7 teacher at Central Park Public School in Markham, Ont., said that his school doesn't enforce a ban of physical contact between students, but teachers are encouraged to use their judgment if they see students behaving inappropriately.

"We are not formally trained about what to do with students who are affectionate with each other. If anything, it may come up in casual conversation or advice may be given from administration if we ask for it," Oziel said.

He said that from what he's seen, the hugging doesn't really start until Grade 7, and he wouldn't feel the need to step in unless a student complained about being uncomfortable.

Keeping students in check when it comes to PDAs (public displays of affection) on school grounds is one thing, but what should teachers do if students want a hug from them?

"It's one of those really difficult realities," Petersiel said.

"Building a positive relationship between the child and the teacher is still the most important factor in successful education. For some children, they still need a gentle, thoughtful touch."

Petersiel said that the issue becomes even more sensitive when a male teacher is involved.

"As a male head of school, or when I was principal, I was really careful to get down on my knees, to their level and tried to be very careful about the nature of a hug," he said.

"But there are kids who still need it and you have to be able to offer the warmth and knowledge you have and not be afraid, as long as your intentions are good."

Petersiel said that he once had a student who needed a hug from him every day.

"That was hard because I didn't want anyone else to question what the motivation was, so again, I made sure that it was always very public, I made sure I got down on her level and I gave her a superficial hug," he said.

"But it's hard. You have to be incredibly aware and conscious of the perception of what's going on."

Oziel said that as a male teacher, he is also very conscious about the way he interacts with his students and is careful to limit physical contact as much as he can.

"There are times a particular action by a male teacher, while entirely appropriate, may be deemed otherwise by someone who's watching, while the same may not be thought of if it was a female teacher and student," he said.

"I think male teachers have to be more guarded in their discussions and actions, and more aware of any situation that may seem inappropriate."

Oziel said that in his six years of teaching, he hasn't yet had to deal with a student who was looking for a hug, but he imagines that he'd try to defuse the situation with something less intimate.

"If a student approached me for a hug, there are many other things I could do to counter it, like a high five."

Oziel and Petersiel agree female teachers don't need to be as guarded when it comes to physical contact with students.

The situation becomes even more complicated if it involves a male teacher and female student.

"It's harder with a girl as she gets a little older, because there is an immediate question as to what the intention of an adult is when they hug a child," Petersiel said.

"You have to be really careful about that, but I think you can't pretend that it is not part of a positive educational relationship between an adult and a child."

Social inclusion: a unique approach to teasing and bullying

Dan Goldberg
Special to The CJN

Students in elementary and middle school are social animals. Connection with and acceptance by peers is all-important. Conversations revolve around who is in and who is out, who is up and who is down.

Social skills are not fully developed, however, and the claws are often far tougher than the armour. Many adults still ache over the teasing or exclusion they experienced at school.

Although schools are sometimes reluctant to acknowledge the presence of teasing or bullying – either because they are afraid it will tarnish their reputation or because they have not found a successful way of addressing it – it is a universal phenomenon. I have never met a teenager or adult who has not experienced or witnessed at least one episode of teasing or bullying at school.

The question, therefore, should be not whether teasing or bullying exists at a given school, but rather how the school approaches this inevitable part of growing up.

Even if 90 per cent of all students are thriving socially, that is not enough. A school rooted in Jewish values has a responsibility to provide a caring and nurturing environment for every one of the children who are entrusted to its care.

For educators committed to dealing constructively with teasing and bullying, there is no shortage of handbooks, guest speakers and packaged programs to choose from.

Unfortunately, most approaches fail to deliver the promised "bully-busting" results. New strategies tend to be greeted with a jaded roll of the eyes by educators, parents and even students.

My first encounter with the Social Inclusion Approach (SIA) to teasing and bullying was as a parent at the Alan Howard Waldorf School (now the Waldorf Academy).

This approach was developed by Prof. Kim John Payne (director of the Collaborative Counseling Program at Antioch University New England) and is now in place at 5,000 schools around the world, including all schools in the United Kingdom where the approach is mandated by law.

The Social Inclusion Approach includes a number of features that set it apart from other approaches to teasing and bullying.

For example, where most strategies focus on bullies and bullying behaviour, social inclusion works with the entire school community – faculty, students and parents.

Where other programs may provide educational sessions that label and discourage bullying (most kids already know that teasing isn't nice), the SIA works to foster empathy and compassion along with a practical understanding of how these feelings can be translated into caring behaviour in the context of everyday life at school.

At the heart of this approach is the recognition that in most contexts where bullying takes place, the most powerful party is neither the bully nor the victim. True power lies with the bystanders who are in the majority.

In most settings the bystanders are a silent and passive group, but SIA focuses on creating a culture where students feel empowered, and where speaking up on behalf of a classmate is encouraged and supported. A quick poll in any middle school classroom will reveal that virtually every student knows who gets along and who doesn't, who the leaders and underdogs are, and who is bullying whom.

In spite of this awareness, information is withheld from adults because informing or "tattling" on peers is considered a violation of the unwritten code of the schoolyard. Moreover, it is the experience of many children that involving adults only makes things worse.

The Social Inclusion Approach encourages disclosure by taking a non-punitive, no-blame approach.

Bullies are held accountable for their actions, but the approach is constructive and result-oriented.

Where attempts to "bully the bully into not bullying" invariably increase the suffering of the victim by driving the antisocial behaviour underground, SIA works to humanize and empower all parties involved. In a culture where disclosing to an adult leads to a positive, non-punitive response, students become increasingly willing to speak up.

When I introduced the Social Inclusion Approach at Krieger Schechter Middle School in Baltimore, where I served as head of Judaics from 2005 to 2007, there was a good deal of eye-rolling.

It was not that the faculty or parent body didn't care about teasing and bullying. They cared deeply. However, they were not eager to have their hopes frustrated once again.

After a group of administrators from Krieger Schechter met with Payne, who responded to their doubts and concerns, there was a consensus that this approach had a unique chance of success.

At this point, the Social Inclusion Approach is in its fifth year at Krieger Schechter and continues to be an important part of the culture there.

Program maintains dignity of bully and victim

This is not to say that teasing and bullying have been eradicated. In fact, any program which promises an end to all bullying should be viewed with great suspicion.

However, the faculty, students and parents at Krieger Schechter have developed a shared understanding and set of practices which encourage pro-social behaviour and which reduce the likelihood of teasing and bullying.

When teasing or bullying does occur, there is a process in place that guides all parties (victims, bullies, educators and parents) toward a positive resolution.

Another unique feature of the approach is the use of student helpers. When a case of bullying or serious teasing arises, both the bully and the victim are prepared separately for a problem-solving meeting.

In the prep meeting, both the bully and the victim have a student helper – an older student who takes notes on the experiences and concerns of the student (bully or victim) whom he or she is supporting.

Later on, at the problem-solving meeting, the experiences and concerns of both parties are calmly shared by the student helpers, thereby avoiding the "he-said, she-said" debate that typically occurs when a victim and a bully are brought together.

It is a hugely empowering experience for a victim of bullying to have an admired older student speak up on his or her behalf.

It is also a sobering moment for a bully to hear about the misery, dread, loss of appetite and sleeplessness that his or her behaviour is causing – not from a finger-pointing adult, but from a calm and articulate older student.

At the same time, the dignity of the bully is supported by his or her own student helper. If a kind and empathetic impulse is to be awakened within an aggressive child, his or her humanity cannot be neglected.

Moreover, if compassion and understanding are central values within a school community – as they should be in any Jewish school – then they must be applied universally.

Within the Canadian Jewish community, the Social Inclusion Approach is currently being piloted not at a school but at a summer camp. In the summer of 2009, my wife, Netta Zweig, who is now the SIA point person in Toronto, introduced the approach at Camp Ramah in Canada, where she was serving as the administrative director.

Although this approach had never been implemented in a camp setting, Netta felt that a summer camp offered unique opportunities for social inclusion work. Unlike a school, where the students go home to their families every night, a summer camp is a contained community that encompasses all aspects of a camper's experience.

Over the past two summers, SIA has begun to take root at Camp Ramah.

A committee affectionately known as SWAT (social wellness action team) meets twice a week over the course of the summer to guide the continuing implementation of SIA in camp and to address specific concerns as they arise. The work of the summer SWAT team is carried out during the year by Ramah's lay social health committee.

Although the Social Inclusion Approach was not specifically developed for use within Jewish schools, its underlying values are very Jewish in character. In working with both Krieger Schechter and Camp Ramah, Payne has noted the affinity for this approach that exists within the Jewish community where derech eretz (respect) is a core value.

A central goal at any Jewish school is to teach the students to act in accordance with the ethical principles of our tradition.

A Jewish school should have a Jewish soul. It should be a place where all members of the community are treated with dignity and respect. A child who excels in Hebrew, Bible and Talmud but routinely teases and embarrasses classmates has failed to receive a proper Jewish education.

As educators at any Jewish institution – school or camp – I believe the highest achievement to which we can aspire is for the young people entrusted to our care to look back at their experience with us as a time when they felt valued as human beings and where they felt inspired to value others.

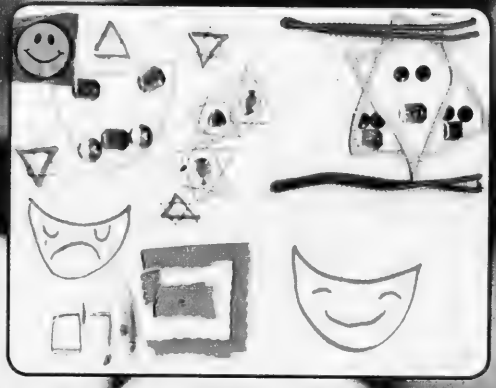
Celebrate Purim with Kachol Lavan



Purim in Israel is one of the country's most beautiful holidays. It is marked by tions of varied creative and ethnic customs. Above all, Purim in Israel means

As most of us know, one of the key mitzvot of Purim is to celebrate to the maximu of this mitzvah, the large cities of Israel used to host rather boisterous parades

The streets were packed with throngs of people watching the festivities unfold and controlled mayhem. Clowns, dancers, magicians, bands and a variety of other perfo beautiful costumes led the way. In some cities even the mayor joined the festivities.

Today, however, due to security and budgetary reasons, the streets are much As some of you also know, in cities that were surrounded by a wall, such as Jerusalem Purim was always delayed by 24 hours. The reason for this was to recall that it took lo of ancient Persia to get to the enemies who were hidden inside the wall that surrounde Shushan.

מי מאיתנו בגיל העשרים המאוחרות ויותר לא מתגעגע למצעדי העדלאידע בתל אביב, חיפה, ירושליים וערים רבות אחרות ברחבי ישראל?

בבתי הספר מכינים הופעות, משחקים משחקי פורים, תחרויות תחפושות וחילופי משלוחי מנות. יש בתי ספר שכבר כשבועיים לפני החג, מיד עם כניסתו של חודש אדר, מתחילים עם חלוקת קרטיבים ופעילות לקראת החג בחצר בית הספר במהלך ההפסקה.

את המאפיות השונות, ממלאים באוזני המן, האוזן הנאכלת ביותר היא אוזן המן עם פרג טחון ומתוק.

בירושליים, צפת ובערים נוספות המוקפות חומה, חוגגים את החג בשושן פורים, כל זאת מכיוון שלקח עוד 24 שעות ליהודים בתקופה זו לגבור על היריבים שהתחבאו בתוך חומות העיר שושן.

פה בטורונטו חוגגים את חג הפורים במסיבות הנערכות בבתי הספר, ובתכניות הלימוד השונות כדוגמת כחול לבן המרכז ללימודי עברית וישראל. השנה תערך מסיבה המונית בסניף הצפוני של המרכז בתורנהיל, בהשתתפות כל ילדי המרכז. המסיבה תתקיים ביום ראשון ה 20 למרץ, בשעה 11:00 – 12:00 התכנית תכלול אירוח ילדים מתחת לגיל 4 עם הוריהם, שירים, ריקודים, תחפושות, הצגה ואוירה של קרנבל פורים אמיתי.

אם בשמחה ובחגיגה אנחנו עוסקים, אז אנא רשמו לפניכם שביום ראשון ה 15 למאי יחגוג כחול לבן 5 שנים לקיומו עם עינת שרוף – הזמרת הסוחפת ביותר היום בישראל. הערב יוקדש לגיוס כספים לפיתוחו של מרכז כחול לבן ויכלול הופעה בת שעתיים וכיבוד. לפרטים: 905-482-1818 ext: 208 events@kachol-lavan.com

Math teaches kids more than just numeracy

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Lori Shapero-Press, a Grade 1 teacher at Toronto's Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, believes that math studies in elementary school impart broader lessons that students can use throughout their lives.

"It's all about problem-solving in life and making your way," said Shapero-Press, who earned her master's of education degree with a specialty in math education six years ago from the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

"In any situation in life, you need to step back, reassess [the situation], read it, try an approach to solve it, and if the solution doesn't make sense, you try another approach."

One method that she uses in the classroom is having students think aloud when they're doing math. As a result, she said, they learn strategies from one another.

She tells students she doesn't want to know what the answer is; she wants to know the strategy. "Obviously the right answer is important, but the most important thing with young children is the process."

Shapero-Press' love for math dates back to her childhood. "I grew up in a family that loved games," she said. "We did a lot of number games and math games.

"I always loved figuring out math and puzzles. It just excited me, and it made sense... You get that light bulb to go off."

She said it's important for parents to use math at home with their children, and that there are many card games and board games that involve math.

A mother of three, she sometimes introduces a math problem at dinner, perhaps telling her children that there are 12 strawberries for them to share, and that "we have to make it fair."

Or she might ask them how much time there is until they have to leave the house. "I just throw it in there. We're using it all the time."

Lori Shapero-Press

Carol Klarman

Carol Klarman, who teaches Grade 1 at Topcliff Public School, also believes that math has relevance in life. "We really have to train children to be problem solvers," she said. "I think we have to provide them with what we call deeper thinking skills, questions where the answer is not [right or wrong] and can't be memorized."

"I think a big part of it is that we don't know what we're training children for. Technology is changing so fast."

Klarman said she was math phobic and a "horrible" math student until she started teaching the subject herself. For years, she said, she didn't understand that math was about "pattern" rather than finding the right answer.

Math problems should be relevant to kids

When teachers "step back and let the students become their own problem solvers," it helps them understand and remember the concepts, said Klarman, who has been teaching for 18 years and has also completed an additional qualification course in math at York University.

By assigning her students open-ended math problems such as, "If Cookie Monster has 10 cookies and wants to put them on two plates, think of all the ways he can do that," Klarman can assess variables like the number of answers the students come up with, and whether they are approaching the problem in a systematic way. "You're looking to see that they understand the math that's going on."

To get students to think, she likes to pose questions "in a problem-solving way." She offered as an example a "what geometric shape am I?" riddle.

Eric Golombek, principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre, said that few elementary school teachers have extensive training in math. "Many come out of university with math anxiety. It's important that we develop the comfort level and expertise of those teachers, so they don't pass on any math anxiety [to their students].

"Many tend to be women who have not had great math experiences, and we want to make sure they are positive role models for the next generation of girls," he added.

Golombek, who has conducted professional development math sessions for teachers at national conferences, said that another issue is that, in North America, there's a tendency to "spoon-feed approaches" to doing math.

"We don't give children enough time to truly engage in thinking mathematically. Children need experiences struggling with authentic problems that are challenging, without teachers stepping in."

As well, he said, math problems should be relevant to students. Historically, math has often been taught "in isolation from how it's useful.

"Children can relate to the math if it's important to them."

Golombek doesn't see math as a hard sell. "I think kids are naturally inquisitive. They like challenges. When it's framed in terms of something that's relevant for them, children are eager to do math."

Finding the daycare you want can be a challenge

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

When we first discovered we were expecting our first child, the shock, joy and excitement were overwhelming. It took us a while to really believe that we would soon, God willing, become parents.

Once the pregnancy became less of a concept and more of a reality, it was time to get organized.

We needed to make doctors appointments, decide on a hospital, find an obstetrician and sign up for prenatal classes.

Having everything in order before my baby bump started to show made me feel empowered and confident.

Now all I had to do was look forward to meeting my baby and enjoying a full year of maternity leave.

"So, have you started looking into daycare yet?" a new mother asked me.

Seriously? Even for someone like me, who loves to plan ahead and prepare well in advance, the idea of deciding on the best daycare for a fetus was ludicrous.

I brushed off the question and judged the mother for being a little too "Type A" for her own good, and decided that I could at least wait until the baby was able to sit up on its own – outside of my womb – before I started to inquire about daycare.

It wasn't until my baby was about four months old that I started to understand why she asked me that question.

We all want the best for our children. Making a checklist of what you want in a daycare is the easy part. Finding a daycare that offers what you want can be more difficult. And getting your child into one without having to be placed on a two-year waiting list can seem almost impossible.

If you're not particular about the programming, it might not be so hard. But in our case, my husband and I wanted our son to be in a Jewish daycare with a good staff-to-child ratio, one that served kosher food and taught the kids to speak Hebrew.

After doing an Internet search of Jewish daycares in the Greater Toronto Area, I began skimming the websites, weighing the pros and cons of what each centre had to offer.

Honestly, it felt a lot like being a high school student again, trying to figure out the top three universities I wanted to apply to.

I came up with a few places and immediately started making phone calls.

I discovered that there are many centres in the GTA that devote at least part of the day to Jewish and Hebrew programming. They include Advanced Care and Education (ACE) daycare and Alef Bet daycare in Thornhill, Four Season's Child Care centre in Maple, and Gan Shalom Nursery and Gan Yeladim Day Care Centre in Toronto. But for some, the demand is so high that the waiting list can be two years long.

I started to get a little worried. What would I do if I couldn't get my son into a program before it was time for me to go back to work?

I started polling my young mom friends who had recently been through the daycare search themselves.

One of my friends said she remembered visiting a home daycare that offered a beautiful, clean space and programming entirely in Hebrew, and it served kosher food.

She said the only part of the curriculum that raised concern for her and her husband was the fact that the staff spoke Hebrew all day long.

They worried that their daughter wouldn't speak any English if she was exposed only to Hebrew five days a week, or that it might confuse her to hear Hebrew at daycare and English at home. In the end, they opted for another daycare.

Ironically, the very thing that turned them off from the home daycare was what my husband and I were most excited about.

We have often heard the cliché that babies are like sponges and are able to learn new languages much more easily than adults.

We always knew that our son would be exposed to different languages growing up – my parents are Israeli immigrants who speak Hebrew at home, my in-laws are Spanish Moroccans who speak both French and Spanish, while my husband and I speak English at home.

So when we learned about a daycare that offered Hebrew all day long, we jumped on the opportunity to expose him to a second language. Thankfully, they had the space, and my son's been enjoying his time there since January.

Of course, he is only 14 months old and is still only building on his five-word English vocabulary, so maybe we're taking this daycare thing a little too seriously.

As a working mom, all I can really ask for is that he doesn't cry when I drop him off, he plays, eats and sleeps well at daycare and crawls enthusiastically toward me when I come to pick him up.

Everything else at this point is just gravy.

A year at Bar-Ilan – not just academics

Rachel Miller
Special to The CJN

We wake up at the crack of dawn, freezing as if we're in Toronto in February. It's cold and it's damp. We quickly get dressed, drag our bags to the bus and get on board.

There are tea and cookies for us if we want, but at 4:30 a.m., no one is all that hungry. By 4:45 we are off.

It's a short drive, and my excitement builds as we close in on our destination. At least mine does. I think the rest of the people on the bus have fallen asleep again.

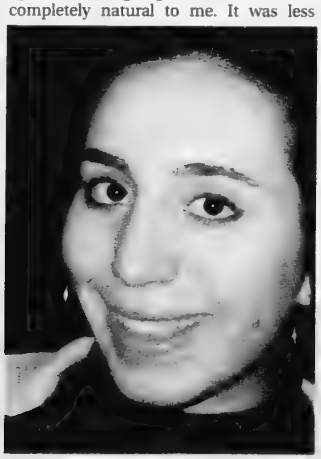
When we arrive, we are taken on a 10-minute hike on an upward path. As we reach the top and the view comes into sight, all the huffing and puffing seem worth it. The Israeli Negev is lit by the predawn sun. It's spectacular.

I open my siddur and start saying the morning prayers. Now, I have yet another level of appreciation for the beauty of this world and specifically the amazing country Israel, which I am lucky enough to call home.

Coming to Israel was not an easy choice. I was lucky enough to have been accepted at all the universities I had applied to in Ontario. It wasn't easy to turn my back on all those offers and basically put my life on hold for a year. But I knew that I wasn't ready for university, and Israel called.

I attended Associated Hebrew Schools from kindergarten to Grade 8, when I switched to Vaughan Secondary School, a public high school. Though no longer a part of the Jewish school system, I began my involvement with Torah High and National Council of Synagogue Youth (NCSY). NCSY is a Jewish youth group aimed at teenagers who are interested in exploring their Jewish roots. I loved it – in fact, it became a key part of my life. The crazier things got in my life, the deeper I delved into Judaism.

When an adviser from NCSY brought up the idea of going to Israel, it seemed completely natural to me. It was less natural for my parents, but they eventually came around. I knew that in order to grow into the person I wanted to become, I needed to be in Israel. At the beginning of October, I left for my new home in Ramat Efal.



Rachel Miller

The program I'm in is the Israel Experience at Bar-Ilan University, a mixture of both Jewish studies and first-year university courses. Right from the beginning, I loved the program.

I had been to Israel once before, as a participant on the March of the Living. I was deeply touched by the experiences in both Poland and Israel. However, I did not really get to see the country.

With the Israel Experience at Bar-Ilan, we are constantly on the move, seeing all parts of our homeland. Even better, this is done with a great group of students and some of the most amazing teachers you will ever meet.

Recently, we went to Caesarea. Everyone climbed over the fence to go down to the freshwater pools. It was a bonding moment. Later, the guide told us that we were the first group he had seen to do that. We were also the only program he had seen to put on skits and other small group presentations at the coliseum. That's just what we do.

We students aren't the only ones who like doing out-of-the-ordinary things. Often, there's a staff member leading us to do things we might never have tried. They have led runs up mountains during a long hike through the Negev, and an onion fight while we were volunteering with Table to Table, an organization that grows and harvests food for the hungry.

Despite their troublemaking tendencies, the program would not be the same without them. They have so much to teach and I have learned so much from everyone involved with making the program great. I appreciate that a good part of my growth is the result of the hard work put in by the staff and madrichim.

Twice a week, one of our av bayits (house fathers), Ari Yablok, does two classes with us. I love going over to his place and learning with him or his wife, Ayelet. They are such warm, welcoming people, taking care of us 24 hours a day, on top of caring for their own family.

Meir Balofsky, informal educational director, has people at his house every week for a tisch (a gathering where we sing songs, tell stories and give l'chaims) every Thursday and for Shabbat. He is always a blast to be around and is definitely one of the reasons I love this program. I go to his house at least once a week, and have become really close to the whole Balofsky family.

That's something that's great here – everyone is warm and welcoming. From the beginning, I felt as though I was home.

And it's not just the program. Everywhere you go in Israel, you meet people who are willing to help you out or have a conversation with you on the street.

That's not something I ever really imagined until I got here. I love that you can ask someone for directions and they will walk with you at least part of the way to make sure you get where you need to go. It's one of many things I love about this country.

Everywhere I go I have a new love and respect for Israel. The amazement has not gone away, and I try hard to make sure it never will.

Every time I pray at the Kotel, I marvel at the fact that Jews all over the world pray facing Jerusalem, and I am doing services right in Jerusalem.

Being here has just blown me away. I have learned so much about myself and am growing religiously and personally in ways I could not have begun to expect.

I know that when I do leave, I will not be the same person as the one who arrived last October. I have a love for Israel now that goes beyond words.

Downtown Jewish day school 'bursting at the seams'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It's a commute that only the most committed of parents would undertake.

Every day, kids from as far away as the Beach, High Park and the Danforth make the trek to the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, housed in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (JCC) at the corner of Bloor and Spadina.

Perhaps it's the diversity of the student body or the school's focus on creativity and community, but there's something about the school that attracts the support of such far-flung families, said school principal Rhonda Rosenheck.

In fact, the school is proving so popular – largely with families in the Annex, but as far north as Lawrence Avenue – that it's planning a significant expansion. Starting next September, the school will offer a second senior kindergarten class for as many as 16 kids. It has also acquired two additional rooms, and its board has adopted a growth plan that will see it rent outside space beginning in 2013 to house grades 6, 7 and 8. Longer term, a move to an entirely new facility that could accommodate up to 350 students is being considered.

Currently, the school educates 157 youngsters from kindergarten to Grade 8. It rents eight classrooms and two program rooms for arts and music, plus use of the JCC's salt-water swimming pool. It also has arranged for access to the roof for recess and it can use nearby fields owned by the University of Toronto for lunch and recess.

While space is at a premium, that hasn't stopped parents from trying to enrol their children.

"Twenty-four is the SK cap, and for the last several years we've had a waiting list. We simply had to turn away people. That had become a pattern," Rosenheck said.

When the school started 13 years ago – "we're in our bar mitzvah year," she quipped – its enrolment was only 10 children.

But, "the Jewish population is growing downtown," Rosenheck said. "It has a different makeup of families who are making the choice not to live in the heavily Jewish neighbourhoods up north.

"The families coming to us have a lot of diversity. They're religiously mixed, racially mixed, with single-gender families.

"There's a very broad diversity of families here and for most, they would go to public schools if not our school," she said.

"Our attitude is, 'Thank God we are so diverse.'"

In addition to teaching Hebrew, Judaic studies and French, the school's overarching message is that "we don't all have to be the same to have a strong Jewish community."

The children learn "to be open to other ways of being Jewish," Rosenheck said.

Apparently the message is being received loud and clear. With interest in the school growing, "the board made the philosophical decision to grow. We considered a new facility, but found it's not feasible," she said.

As the school continues to add more children, enrolment might one day reach as many as 350 youngsters, Rosenheck speculated. That would far exceed the space currently available. The board is acting conservatively by adding a kindergarten class while expanding to a facility close to the JCC.

"We've been working with the owners and broker of a building nearby, and we've budgeted for the leasing costs," she said. Such a move would be an interim measure. "It gives us the time to raise $8 million to $12 million to create the space that we really need for the school."

Rosenheck expects that "in two to four years, we'll know where the growth stage will go. We're all bursting at the seams and we need the attention of UJA Federation and donors to show during the incremental growth stage that the community is growing and this is what the people moving and living here want."

B'NAI MITZVAH

Leo Baeck offers International Baccalaureate program

Cara Stern
Special to The CJN

Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School has become the only Jewish day school in North America to offer the International Baccalaureate program.

"It is the highest form of international education," said Desmond Bender, dean of academic development for the school.

The program, which applies to students from grades 6 through 8, emphasizes critical thinking skills and presenting multiple perspectives so students can learn to come to their own conclusions about difficult issues, said Eric Petersiel, head of the school.

Despite the IB authorization, the curriculum won't change, he said. Instead, the teachers will use IB-approved approaches to convey the same material.

The program was initially created so children of diplomats could move every few years and their education wouldn't suffer, he explained. "It takes whatever curriculum you teach in the place that you are, and applies pedagogic practices to raise up the level of education."

One of the differences from regular teaching methods is the connection of subject material from one class to another.

"Our brains don't compartmentalize," Bender said. "It's this linkage, this connection between what you learn and the world, and what you learn in one subject and another subject."

Principal of Leo Baeck south campus, Jonathan Harris, said the notion of questioning knowledge rather than simple acceptance is central to both IB and Leo Baeck philosophies.

"We speak often of teaching our students to make positive Jewish choices, and we take an active, rather than a doctrinaire, approach to Judaism," he said in an e-mail.

It took about seven years to complete the transition, beginning with former director of the school Zita Gardner's retirement, Bender said. "It was her swan song to implement this program."

Throughout the years, the teachers have trained to use IB methods, Petersiel said. "We had to show evidence that we were already engaging in innovative education practices."

Petersiel said he doesn't expect the addition to cause an influx of students to the school. Although parents are aware of the program, the school is mostly at capacity.

Laurie Davis, president of the school's board, and whose three children have gone through the Leo Baeck program, said IB's mission statement seems to be a perfect match for the school.

"The parallel was uncanny," she said. "It was almost as if the IB philosophies were written with a liberal Jewish day school in mind."

For example, IB stresses a responsibility to other people in the world, which Petersiel calls a basic tenet of good Jewish education.

These parallels make Leo Baeck unique, he said, as many other schools have difficulty accepting some of the basic fundamentals of the programs, such as the requirement to teach a second language – an issue for many American applicant schools.

However, he said, Leo Baeck teaches French and Hebrew, allowing them to exceed this requirement.

There are currently 72 other IB-authorized schools in Ontario, 20 of which run the Middle Years Programme – the one being implemented at Leo Baeck.

As Leo Baeck has classes only up to Grade 8, the students won't receive a diploma. However, they can complete the final two years of the five-year program at an IB-authorized secondary school.

Regardless, Bender said there are benefits to studying under the IB philosophies even without the incentive of a diploma.

"The skills that they develop are especially critical thinking and informed decision making, and those skills are transferrable to any school," he said.

Additionally, teachers from all grades will be expected to use IB techniques, even for students in the primary years.

Through the program, students "become far more worldly in their outlook and their ability to critically assess what is out there," Bender said. "We owe our kids the very best, and we feel this is how we can achieve that."

How kids address teachers: What's in a name?

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Four years ago, Toronto's Leo Baeck Day School reversed a long-standing policy regarding the way in which students are expected to address teachers.

For the first 34 years of the school's existence, kids called teachers and administrators by their first names, but now they use titles and surnames.

The change at the school bucks a trend of increasing informality in the greater community. "This is not a society where the average adult has a title," said Eric Petersiel, Leo Baeck's head of school. "Parents' friends, by and large, are first names for everybody now. For me to be Mr. Petersiel is totally out of the norm of who I am in life."

The new policy, instituted while he was principal of the school's south branch, was prompted by the staff, he said.

But far more important than mode of address, according to Petersiel, is how teachers build a relationship with their students "in a respectful and meaningful manner."

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said there are "no hard and fast rules" regarding how students address teachers at the two-campus secondary school. "But," he added, "I think very few if any teachers are called by their first names."

In the 1960s, and even more so in the 1970s, it began to be more common for students to call teachers by their first names, Shaviv said. "Most people understood that for a classroom to be effective, the relationships have to be clear. While a teacher can be friendly with the students, they should not be the friends of the students.

"It has to be noted that a teacher, particularly at the high school level, should never be part of a social circle or an emotional circle... There has to be a dividing line between the teacher and the social network."

The British-born Shaviv, who began his career in London, said that while in England, he saw very formal relationships between teachers and students, as well as very informal ones.

It is "actually much harder" to make the informal relationship work successfully in an educational setting, he said. "The line becomes blurred, and I think that can be an impediment to the educational process.

"Different standards can be appropriate in different schools, but at the end of the day, it's the actual teaching and education that count.

"I tend to lean on the side of maintaining clear boundaries."

At the Toronto Heschel School, students use the title "Moreh" or "Morah" – the gender-specific Hebrew words for "teacher" – followed by the staff member's first name.

School founders implemented the policy to minimize "an artificial gap" between teachers and students, according to Gail Baker, Heschel's principal and head of school.

There is already a "natural" gap because of the teachers' roles, she said. "Those are to be respected. We don't even think about it any more.

"We wanted to say that there is a difference. We all have our roles... We wanted to make that statement, but we didn't want to make it bigger than it needed to be."

Earlier in her career, she answered to "Ms. Baker." Now, she said, "it would be strange to go back... This was kind of a breath of fresh air. It just felt right."

At the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, there is still less formality, and also less uniformity. "People get to be called what they like," said principal Rhonda Rosenheck, who prefers to be called by her first name.

She said she's never found that being on a first-name basis diminishes the respect she receives or her sense of authority. "Nobody is confused about my role."

However, she said, she wondered whether a title might be an advantage for an educator who looks young or less authoritative.

Mitch Parker – principal and clinical director of Zareinu Educational Centre, whose students have special needs – is either "Mitch" or "Dr. Parker," depending on the context.

"We try to maintain a reasonably informal atmosphere in the school," Parker said. As well, both he and Rosenheck noted that their first names are easier to say.

However, Zareinu has a class that runs out of Eitz Chaim Day School, where staff members are referred to by their titles, and where he is known as "Dr. Parker."

Although he has preferred to be known by his first name since he began his career 30 years ago, he noted that "in certain settings, maintaining that level of intimacy is not appropriate. Students have to learn that sometimes it's appropriate and sometimes it's not."

Using his first name indicates in part that "we're all in this together," Parker said.

But, whether or not a title is used, he believes that students will respect him "if I'm doing my job the right way, and if I treat them in a respectful way."

Travelling teaches lessons not found in the classroom

Yosef Tastassa
Special to The CJN

Leaving a routine life to travel around the world as a couple is one thing. Doing the same thing as a family is completely different – and much more complicated.

In July 2009, my wife Estelle and I and our three children – ages 11, 8 and 2 – left our home in Israel to embark on a 10-month trip through Thailand, Vietnam, China, Australia and New Zealand.

It took us six months to prepare for the journey, because we had to make arrangements for such things as health coverage, transportation, insurance and logistics. The most complicated issue was the education of our two older daughters, Hila and Ariel.

Prior to our departure, we co-ordinated their educational program with the Israeli Ministry of Education, and with our daughters' school principals.

The decision was to teach Hila and Ariel mathematics, English and Hebrew literature while we were travelling, beginning in September once summer break was over.

After our trip, the girls completed the last six weeks of their school year in Israel.

Estelle is a special education teacher, and we felt comfortable with the fact that we would have to do all the teaching while we were travelling.

At the beginning of September, we found ourselves living in a motor home and crossing the huge Australian Outback. Three or four times a week, after eating breakfast and washing the dishes, we pulled the schoolbooks out of the closet and taught the girls for two hours at a time.

Although Hila and Ariel are very disciplined, at first it was difficult for them to accept their parents as teachers. Also, we parked at campsites, and everything distracted them – geese, lakes, trees, forests.

But there are advantages to one-on-one teaching, and soon it became part of their normal routine.

Six months into the trip, the girls – who could barely speak English when we left home – had a fluent spoken language and a rich vocabulary. We moved to Toronto last summer, and their language skills helped them a lot during their first few weeks at a Canadian public school in the fall.

But in retrospect, general studies – even though they are very important – were not the most important thing they learned.

We are grateful to God and to the circumstances that life gave us. The fact that two young girls and their little toddler brother had the chance to see and experience the world with their own eyes is a priceless gift.

Not many people have met the long neck tribes on the Thailand-Burma border, cooked traditional foods with the minority tribes of remote North Vietnam, danced in folk festivals in western China, learned the unique tradition of the Aboriginal Australians, or joined the famous Maori Hakka dance in New Zealand – all by the age of nine. When we visited cooking schools in Thailand and North Vietnam, Hila and Ariel held in their hands fruits, vegetables and spices that I don't even know the names for.

In New Zealand, when we met the Maoris, we told the girls that the British had conquered New Zealand and that now the Maoris – the indigenous people – are re-establishing their own identity. We compared it to what happened when Judaism was suppressed by the Romans and we kept our own culture. They learned a lot of history.

The girls matured a lot. There are many things that schools cannot give, starting with true respect for other cultures and languages, learning geography through one's eyes rather than from books, learning life skills like getting along in a strange neighbourhood, and understanding that life is not perfect and that there are obstacles of all kinds that one must strive to overcome.

In Israel, everything was in place. Everything was known. But there are many things that change in life. Going on a journey where every day is a new day gave the children the feeling that even though we're not in control of everything, it's fine. They became much more adaptable.

But the most important thing for us was that we became a better family. When siblings live together for 315 days in a 40-square-foot space, there is no escape, either physical or mental. Some days, I would drive 11 hours without stopping.

Increased patience, tolerance, respect, collaboration and consideration were wonderful byproducts of our journey.

One Purim, two different ceremonies

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife, Sara, celebrated Purim at the prime minister's office on Sunday by receiving children from a nearby hospital. Outside the prime minister's office, merely metres away in the protest tent erected on behalf of Gilad Schalit, the IDF soldier kidnapped by Hamas nearly five years ago, Gilad's father, Noam, right, listens to the reading of Megillat Esther.

Canada honours Congress

Environment Minister Peter Kent, left, the minister responsible for Parks Canada, presided over the commemoration of the national historic significance of the founding of the Canadian Jewish Congress in a ceremony last week in Montreal. Mark Freiman, Congress' national president, stands with Kent alongside the new plaque. The inscription on it reads, in part, "Regarded by many as the 'Parliament of Canadian Jewry,' the Congress continues to provide a voice for the Canadian Jewish community both nationally and internationally." Please see related story on page 32.

Teen Committed

MONTREAL — Maor Attar, 19, was found not criminally responsible for murdering his sister by a Quebec Superior Court judge March 16 because he's schizophrenic. He'll spend an indefinite period at the Philippe Pinel Institute for killing Shirel Attar, 14, in their Côte St. Luc home last summer. He's been held there since his arrest hours after repeatedly stabbing and bludgeoning the girl, obeying, as the court heard, voices in his head. He'll be assessed annually to see if he's fit for release. He had no previous diagnosis of mental illness.

Diplomat Speaks

MONTREAL — Israel's first Bedouin diplomat, Ishmael Khaldi, spoke to a receptive audience of more than 100 students and teachers at Collège Laflèche in Trois-Rivières, Que., during Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW). Although the school didn't formally take part in IAW, there is campus support for boycotting Israel. Khaldi, whose visit was organized by the Quebec-Israel Committee, is a former deputy consul in San Francisco, one of the highest ranks ever held by an Israeli Muslim. Now an adviser to Foreign Affairs Minister Avigdor Lieberman, he didn't deny discrimination exists in Israel, but he said he's proud to be Israeli.

Trip Impact Studied

BOSTON — The impact of a Taglit-Birthright trip is significant and lasts for years, a new study says. Participants in the 10-day Israel trips are more confident advocates for Israel, are 46 per cent more likely to feel very connected to Israel, and are 51 per cent more likely to marry a Jew than their peers who applied for, but didn't go for space reasons, on a Birthright trip. These are some of the findings of The Impact of Taglit-Birthright Israel: 2010 Update, a study by Brandeis University's Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies. It follows the centre's 2009 report, Generation Birthright Israel, and looks at 2,000 young Jews who applied for and/or went on Birthright trips from 2001 to 2005.

Sweden Urged to Protect Jews

STOCKHOLM — The Simon Wiesenthal Center called on the Swedish government to assume the cost of protecting the Jewish community.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

Senior SWC officials, who visited Stockholm and Malmo on a week-long fact-finding trip, accused the government of making the Jewish community pay the equivalent of a "Jewish tax," requiring it to pay for most security measures, including barriers against attacks outside the shul during services.

The Jewish community is in danger in Sweden, the centre said. "Sweden intelligence has identified over 400 Islamist radicals and neo-Nazis," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, its associate dean, in a statement issued March 15 from Stockholm. "Coupled with global threats from 'lone wolf' operatives, Jews are a primary target for hate crimes and terrorists."

Centre officials met in the southern city of Malmo with key political, Jewish and Muslim officials and top police officials. The centre issued a travel advisory for Jews on Sweden's third-largest city last December after a spate of antisemitic incidents was ignored.

Some 800 Jews live in Malmo among a total population of 300,000, which includes a large, mainly Muslim, immigrant community. About 400 antisemitic acts were registered in Malmo in 2009 – more than half of the total number of hate crimes in the city. A 2009 Davis Cup tennis match there between Sweden and Israel took place in an empty stadium due to security concerns after anti-Israel protests over the Gaza war.

Memorial held for slain West Bank residents

Family 'killed because they were Jews'

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Udi, aged 36. Ruth, 35. Yoav, 11. Elad, 4. Hadas, just three months old.

The names of the Fogel family rang out at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation last Thursday evening in a moving memorial service to the members of the clan who were butchered by Palestinian terrorists in their West Bank home on the night of March 11.

Calls for unity and strength – and to refrain from revenge – were sounded at the hour-long service organized by Shaarei Shomayim and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The somber memorial, attended by about 800 people, coincided with the pre-Purim Fast of Esther, which commemorates the fast by Jews of the ancient Persian empire before a battle against their enemies.

In a horrific crime that sickened even hardened Israelis, the five members of the Fogel family were stabbed to death by one, or possibly two, terrorists who snuck into the West Bank settlement of Itamar on a Friday night.

The blood-soaked images were splashed on the front pages of Israeli newspapers and websites, amid warnings of their graphic content.

The children were stabbed in their sleep. Two other Fogel children reportedly slept through the nightmare and were unharmed. The family's eldest daughter, Tamar, 12, returned home from a Bnei Akiva youth meeting to make her harrowing discovery.

Though saying he was "lost for words," Israel "will not stop until these [attackers] are brought to justice," pledged Amir Gissin, the country's consul general in Toronto.

Gissin blasted the "hypocrisy" of western governments for outwardly supporting Israel but also funding the Palestinian Authority.

He said "it doesn't matter if prisoners in Israel have stolen a car or murdered a baby. The families of prisoners held in Israeli jails will continue to be supported. Their families will get monthly payments from the PA. It's part of their budget. Where is this money coming from? It's coming from western governments.

Sanctimony, not integrity

From the editor's desk...

Of the many qualities that attach to the proponents of the campaign against Israel acronymically known as BDS – boycott, divestment and sanctions – integrity is not among them.

One can talk about commitment. They are certainly committed and faithful to their objective to the point of zealotry. Indeed, in an off-kilter sort of way, one can even talk about a misplaced and misdirected idealism animating some of the activists in their campaign against the Jewish state.

But integrity is utterly missing in their behaviour. Nor is it surprising that it is because integrity requires some concession to truth and honesty.

The BDS proponents make none and are quite pleased not to. They concede only to their ideology, which, rather than truth, prefers the sanctimony of self-justification.

Were the BDS crowd even minimalist seekers of truth and endorsers of honesty, they might have expressed surprise, if not regret, that the government of Iran had been caught last week trying to send some 50 tons of weapons to its Hamas proxies who rule Gaza.

The arms were hidden under sacks of cotton and lentils in three of the dozens of containers aboard the Liberian-registered ship Victoria.

Among the weapons found were six C-704 shore-to-sea missiles (made in Iran according to Chinese specifications), 230 120-mm mortar shells, which have a range of 10 kilometres; 2,260 60-mm mortars, whose range is 2.5 kilometres and 74,889 Kalashnikov rifle bullets.

The weapons, of course, were intended to be used against Israelis, much like the Grad rocket that was launched from Gaza into southern Ashkelon on Sunday evening and the 50 rockets fired from Gaza into southern Israel last Saturday evening.

The Victoria was interdicted by the Israeli navy, its arms seized. Then it was released to continue its journey.

Given Hamas' declared intention and its ongoing efforts at waging genocidal war against the Jewish state, no fair-minded individual would suggest that it was unlawful or even unreasonable for Israel to intercept those weapons.

Moreover, no country in Israel's situation, facing the threats it does from so many hostile neighbours, would act differently than Israel acted and acts to protect its citizens.

Israel's naval blockade of Gaza has a narrow purpose, namely to prevent guns and missiles from reaching Hamas. It achieved that purpose last week without disruption to the welfare or well-being of the people of Gaza.

The collaboration between Iran and Hamas does not seem to offend the conscience of the high-minded BDS crowd. They offered no comment, issued no press release, found no reason to express disappointment of any kind in Gaza's leaders.

There would not be anything amiss with the lack of discomfort on the part of the BDS-ers if Mahmoud Ahmadinejad (the Iranian leader) and Ismail Haniyah (the Hamas leader) were collaborating on, say, preventing erosion of Gaza farmlands, desalinizing the salty waters of the Mediterranean, or even replacing the former Israeli agricultural hothouses destroyed by Hamas in 2005.

But the entire world knows that the Iranians and the Hamas Gazans collaborate and co-operate on one objective only. The Iranian leader has so often and so earnestly expressed it: "wiping Israel off the map."

Yet the BDS group that operates the Canadian Boat to Gaza website blithely, and likely blissfully too, proceeds undaunted in their mission "to send a Canadian boat to challenge the blockade of Gaza, in co-ordination with similar international efforts."

That they have no regard for the truth is proven in the following passage on the website. "The blockade of Gaza... restricts bringing materials into Gaza and it does not allow anything to leave Gaza either. This, in addition to starving the population, denies the Palestinians of Gaza the ability to trade with the world, further suffocating them."

Nothing about this sentence is true.

As many as 400 trucks a day travel into Gaza from entry points in Israel bringing thousands of tons of supplies and all manner of humanitarian, commercial, construction and consumer goods to the people of Gaza.

The BDS gang's website celebrates the fact that they have already raised $240,000 of the $300,000 they need to set sail the end of May with "the Freedom Flotilla 2."

Abjectly lacking in integrity, the BDS gang is bothered not at all by their disregard and disdain for the truth.

Oh, and by the way, Gilad Schalit still remains a prisoner, almost five years since he was kidnapped by the BDSers' heroic role models.

Cancer patient battles health care system

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

According to the Ontario health-care system, Jill Anzarut, 35, discovered she had breast cancer too early.

The mother of two young children, Anzarut went to her doctor in December after finding "something" on her right breast.

"I had always thought that breast cancer would be detected by an actual lump, but this [didn't feel like that] so I wasn't that worried."

She had it checked out with her doctor, however, who sent her for an ultrasound, and ultimately for a biopsy at Princess Margaret Hospital's rapid diagnosis clinic.

The results were that she had an aggressive form of breast cancer – HER2 (human epidermal growth factor receptor type 2) – and treatment included chemotherapy and the drug Herceptin, which has been found to halve rates of recurrence within four years of diagnosis for women with that type of breast cancer.

Anzarut, who had her first round of chemotherapy on March 9, said the problem is that she does not qualify for the $40,000- or $50,000-a-year medication under OHIP until the tumour is greater than one centimetre, and her benefits package at work does not cover it.

"The irony is that if I purchase the drug privately, government regulations do not allow Princess Margaret Hospital to administer it, so I would have to pay a private clinic. That means even more money."

Ron MacInnes, manager of public affairs at Cancer Care Ontario, said that ultimately, Deb Matthews, minister of Health and Long-Term Care for Ontario, has to approve the funding of the drug.

"Recommendations are based on direct evidence, and [at the size of this tumour] there is no evidence available on [Herceptin's] effectiveness. The decisions are not ours to make."

David Jensen, media relations co-ordinator, communications and information branch, Ministry of Health and Long-Term Care, said that Herceptin is currently funded through the New Drug Funding Program (NDFP) for the treatment of patients with certain types of early stage breast cancer following surgery and after chemotherapy, and the treatment of patients with certain types of metastatic breast cancer.

Reimbursement requires compliance with clinical eligibility criteria developed, based on evidence-based guidelines and approved by the provincial expert committee, he said.

Jensen said the Breast Cancer Disease Site Group (Breast Cancer DSG) produces evidence-based reports to assist practitioner and patient decisions about appropriate health care for specific clinical circumstances. The DSG recommends the use of Herceptin if the patient has a node-negative tumour with size greater than one centimetre.

In a new development, however, it was reported in the March 18 Globe and Mail that the Ontario Ombudsman is investigating the government's failure to provide Anzarut the drug. Andre Marin announced that he is investigating whether the province's decision to limit funding was informed and reasonable. "Based on our informal interviews with oncologists and officials from Cancer Care Ontario and the ministry, I've determined that this case raises issues serious enough to warrant a systemic investigation," he said in a news release.

Anzarut has met with Ken Dryden, member of Parliament for York Centre, and Monte Kwinter, member of provincial parliament for York Centre, who have both been supportive, she said.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced last week, the government's plans to renew support for the Canadian Partnership Against Cancer, an independent, not-for-profit organization whose goal is to help save Canadian lives.

Although weakened from last week's treatment and battling a cough and cold, Anzarut said she is "hanging in. At the end of the day, I have no choice but to take the drug. We'll have to do what we need to do to get it."

Lebovic campus receives government funding

Ottawa to contribute up to $15 million for Phase 3 of new community campus

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Julian Fantino, minister of state for seniors and MP for Vaughan, announced on March 14 that the federal government will contribute up to $15 million toward Phase 3 of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, on Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road in Vaughan.

Fantino made the announcement on behalf of Chuck Strahl, minister of transport, infrastructure and communities.

The estimated total costs for Phase 3 are $45 million, and construction is expected to be completed in fall 2016. Federal support is conditional on the project meeting federal conditions and the signing of a contribution agreement with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, according to a joint news release by the federation and the Canadian government.

The federal funding falls under the major infrastructure component of the Building Canada fund. UJA Federation is responsible for the remaining costs.

The campus already houses the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Centre. New buildings and services are expected to be phased in from 2012 to 2016.

Speaking in the unheated, partly built Schwartz/Reisman Centre – one of three Jewish community centres in the GTA being funded by the federation's $225-million Tomorrow Campaign – Fantino said the announcement was "really about community building." The centre is expected to open in fall 2012.

"Our government remains focused on the economy, and completing our economic recovery is an important task we have embraced," Fantino said.

The project is "a fine example" for its creation of jobs and future recreation facilities that will serve the community, he said.

The project will include a conference centre, theatre and lecture hall, an outdoor pool and multi-purpose facilities that will be available to all York Region citizens.

Fantino credited Bernie Farber, national CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, as one of the main people who helped him understand that the project "is more about community building than a particular project that is singular to one specific community in our city."

An artist's rendering of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus.

Elizabeth Wolfe, chair of the board of UJA Federation, said the new centre will be "a place for everyone – young and old, Jew and gentile, those of all affiliations, abilities and interests. It will be a place of culture and education, recreation and wellness, celebration and integration, health and social services."

Vaughan mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua said the project was "a perfect example of what can be achieved when people pool their resources to bring about positive change."

Ted Sokolsky, president of UJA Federation, said the event was a unique partnership between all levels of government and the non-profit world, and that the project was about both nation-building and city-building.

"The ceremony today is a testimonial to a belief in the future," he added.

Abbas still stuck

Flying essentially undetected last week under the radar of the media's focus on the catastrophe in Japan and the civil war in Libya, was the decaying dirigible of Palestinian aspirations of statehood being steered once again by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas into a parking garage, to sit again unused, rusting a bit more, flying nowhere, soaring no higher than the pavement of the street, where rabble rules and sewage flows into the water.

Rather than dedicate his efforts to finding common ground with Israel, Abbas announced that he will instead invest his time in reconciling with the rulers of Gaza. "I declare that I am ready to go to Gaza... to end the split and form a new government," he said in a speech before senior members of his Fatah Party last week.

Abbas was responding to a publicly expressed invitation by Hamas leader Ismail Haniyah for his West Bank counterpart to come to Gaza to heal the rift between the two governments.

Hamas, it must be remembered, violently and brutally expelled Abbas' Fatah-dominated party from Gaza in 2007. The two factions hate each other and compete for the loyalty of the beleaguered Palestinian people. Indeed, Israel was called upon by Fatah members fleeing Gaza to protect them from the murdering Hamas loyalists chasing them to the border.

Were it to truly moderate and remove from official Hamas dogma such odious doctrines as, "[L]eaving the circle of conflict with Israel is a major act of treason and it will bring curse on its perpetrators," unity between the two factions would be welcome as a possible step toward ultimate peace.

But Abbas' own party, let alone the PA, of which his party is its largest constituent member, is replete with odious doctrines, too. The lionizing and effective "canonizing" of Palestinian terrorists is a case in point. For example, a town square in al-Bireh, near Ramallah was named last week after Dalal Mughrabi, a terrorist who was involved in killing 37 Israelis in 1978.

The ceremony took place barely two days after Palestinian terrorists slaughtered five members of the Fogel family in Itamar in the West Bank. Abbas condemned the atrocity. But his condemnation, though not perfunctory in its language, was nonetheless hollow in its effect, in light of his government's actions essentially endorsing terrorism with the Mughrabi celebration.

There are no peace negotiations now between Israel and the PA. Nor are there prospects that negotiations will resume in the foreseeable future. By preferring to court Hamas rather than an Israeli negotiating partner, Abbas shows that his true objective is to forgo a negotiated peace treaty for an imposed one.

But just like the Palestinian dirigible stuck in the hangar, not moving, such an arrangement will not fly. There cannot be peace if the two parties do not work out its terms.

We must not forget Schalit

Through the Schalit awareness campaign, students are trying to learn about the reality of being held captive by Hamas for four years, the time that Gilad Schalit has been away from his family ("Hillel launches Schalit awareness campaign," Feb. 10). This campaign is crucial for Schalit's release, because it creates both Jewish and non-Jewish opinions, which will help create a mass opinion for the awareness of his capture and his imminent release.

People are forgetting about Schalit. Forgetting is what we're not supposed to do. As a modern Orthodox Jew, I feel as it is my responsibility, along with every other Jew, to remember Schalit. His entire life has been taken away from him, and through various campaigns such as this one, we will be able to take it back. Schalit's story is becoming a symbol of oppression and sadness for the Jews. We can fight for him. We can be unified in this important cause, and maybe someday, Schalit won't be a symbol of sadness and will turn into a symbol of happiness.

Rabbi Kelman's contribution to Reena

I was delighted to read of the Ontario Trillium Foundation grant that is enabling a residence facility now under construction at the Lebovic Campus in Vaughan ("Reena receives Ontario Trillium Foundation Grant," March 10). However, it was hurtful to read that Reena was established by the "parents of children" with developmental disabilities, with the article neglecting to mention their mentor, the late Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who founded the organization.

One person rarely mentioned in connection with Reena is Rochelle Carrady. After reading that Rabbi Kelman was being recognized for enabling a bar mitzvah celebration, the first ever, of a group of Down syndrome children, she spoke with him about her disabled children. Impressed with his initiative, she arranged for him to meet the late Joe Berman and his wife, Helen, known for their caring and financial generosity. As a result, the Bermans established and funded small Reena group homes in place of the large existing institutions. The Reena residences have multiplied over the years under the able administration of Sandy Keshen and her staff, and are supported by the community, along with the parents of disabled children.

Israel and the U.S.

Bert Raphael's March 10 letter, "Israel has always defied the U.S.," fails to distinguish between situations in which Israel and the United States' interests coincide and diverge. In 1967, when Israel easily decimated the Egyptian military, as was predicted by U.S. and Israeli intelligence, Israel was fulfilling its assigned role to counter the threat of Nasser's independent Arab nationalism. However, when, in 2005, Israel declared a firm intention to sell advanced missiles to China, in clear violation of U.S. demands, Israel was forced to not only pass legislation to bar such sales but also to write a letter of apology to the United States for planning the sale. Israel's main enemy isn't Iran or Hamas or Hezbollah, but hubris.

Jews in Guatemala

As a director of a charity that builds schools and educates children in Guatemala, I visit there at least every two months, and I have spoken to Rabbi Jacques Cukierkorn several times ("Letter from Guatemala," March 17). He is a Reform Rabbi who truly "gets" the concept of loving all Jews. His affiliation with Casa Hillel takes him outside of the insular comfort zone that so many Jewish communities around the world have erected for both good and not-so-good reasons. Rabbi Cukierkorn and the Casa Hillel community are committed Jews who foster a love of Judaism, a love of Israel and a love of reaching out to the disadvantaged. Although not part of mainstream Judaism, their commitment to klal Yisrael is no less sincere. Although Casa Hillel is small, it is growing throughout Mexico, Guatemala and Honduras. They are not welcomed by the mainstream community, because they are brown and because they are Reform converts. They are also not solidly middle-class. The "who is a Jew" question isn't just restricted to Israel and first-world countries. It is, unfortunately, alive and well in Guatemala as well.

Kolel and Access Education Guatemala Children's Fund is leading a "voluntour" to Guatemala at the end of April. We will be having Shabbat dinner with Casa Hillel and look forward to sharing our thoughts, dreams and our kavanah with this inspiring group of Jews.

Obama is weak against Mideast strongmen

Aluf Benn
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Libya's ruler Col. Moammar Gadhafi has revealed the weakness of U.S. President Barack Obama. The leader of the superpower called upon Gadhafi to leave – and Gadhafi wasn't scared. The whole world saw how very easy it is to preach democracy and liberty from afar, and how much harder it is to back up the verbiage with military action against a cruel tyrant who slaughters his own citizens.

Gadhafi's determination has tipped the balance, at least for the present, in the struggle for survival by rulers of Arab countries against their peoples in revolt. Saudi Arabia followed in his footsteps and sent its army to Bahrain to rescue the regime of the Sunni minority from the wrath of the Shiite majority. The Americans demanded reforms and openness in Bahrain, and the Saudis have in effect occupied the neighbouring island, which is linked by a bridge to their country.

The harsh and cruel Gadhafi has always tested the normal limits of the behaviour of states and leaders. He has already shown it is possible to survive for years in power under sanctions, threats and even American bombardment. However, the Middle East is full of leaders and governments who have heard demands and dictates from Obama and have simply said, "We've heard you" – and continued doing as they liked unscathed.

During the past two years, for example, Iran has advanced its nuclear program and paid no heed either to Obama's lures or his warnings. For its part, Israel slowed down settlement expansion for a while, because the president demanded it, but then went back to building in the territories.

Even Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said no to Obama, when the president suggested he waive a condemnation of Israel at the United Nations in exchange for a package of benefits and incentives. Fifty minutes on the telephone, and Abbas didn't budge.

Obama always goes with the strong and kicks the weak. When the opposition demonstrations in Iran were brutally suppressed after the falsification of the presidential election results in 2009, Obama disassociated himself from the demonstrators and in effect supported President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. He apparently assessed that the regime would survive and hoped his neutrality would lead to a thaw in the relations between the United States and Iran. But the Iranians interpreted Obama's stance as weakness and showed no interest in the dialogue he offered them.

In Egypt, the masses went out to demonstrate in the streets, and the moment Hosni Mubarak was weakened and the army disassociated itself from him, Obama wiped out 30 years of alliance and co-operation. When it emerged the army had taken control of Egypt, the U.S. president supported the generals. Mubarak and the deposed president of Tunisia hesitated to open fire on the demonstrators and were dethroned. Gadhafi fought back and his rule has been saved. For now.

Obama's successful race for the presidency, centred on the sweeping promise of "change," aroused tremendous expectations. In an instance of putting the cart before the horse, he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize without having done anything. His supporters say that due to the very fact of his presence and the positions he has articulated, he has encouraged supporters of democracy in the Arab world and has lowered the flames in the Middle East.

Their claim is not entirely unfounded. Even before the street revolts in Tunisia and Egypt, the Obama administration had advanced southern Sudan toward independence. The borders between Israel and its neighbours have been a lot quieter since he took office than they were during the terms of his predecessors Bill Clinton and George W. Bush.

Nevertheless, a far more activist foreign policy was expected of Obama. Both those who admire him and those who do not assessed he would force Israel to quit the territories and would establish a Palestinian state in them. And, indeed, Obama went further than his predecessors and declared that the resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was a national interest of the United States. Right after his inauguration, he appointed George Mitchell, who successfully mediated in Northern Ireland, as special envoy to the Middle East.

Here in the Middle East, it was immediately realized that Mitchell was of no value, although he continued to be hosted for futile discussions. He has not been seen for some time now in Jerusalem and Ramallah, even though formally he still holds the envoy position. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is working with Washington now through Mitchell's rival, Dennis Ross.

When he took office, Netanyahu assessed that Obama would try to depose him. His fear of the president led Netanyahu to impose a settlement freeze at the end of 2009. The fear evaporated when the Republicans regained a majority in the House of Representatives last November and positioned themselves as a shield against administration pressure on Israel.

The stance of the House, whose Democratic leaders also offered their support of Jerusalem, pushed Obama to impose a veto on the UN Security Council resolution condemning the settlements – contrary to his administration's position. But recently, when a veteran right-winger asked Netanyahu why he will present a diplomatic plan in the near future, the prime minister explained: "Obama will be elected for a second term."

U.S. President Barack Obama

Since his party's defeat in the congressional elections, Obama has preferred to reach agreements with the Republicans and to rule from the centre. His energies are already focused on his campaign for re-election, and at a time like that, one doesn't wrangle with powerful sectors and lobbies such as supporters of Israel. It seems he is waiting for the diplomatic battle expected this summer in advance of the Palestinian declaration of independence. At that time, Obama will have an opportunity to apply pressure to Netanyahu and Abbas – both will be in need of his support. It is doubtful he will take advantage of this opportunity at the start of his election year. But even if Obama makes public a plan for an Israeli-Palestinian agreement, the sides will likely reject it.

And until summer arrives, Obama will have to deal with the waves of revolt in the Middle East and Netanyahu's insistence on keeping control of the West Bank.

"We don't want Iran 14 miles off our coast, and that's not going to happen," a Saudi official told Washington Post columnist David Ignatius in no uncertain terms. This is how the Saudis are justifying the dispatch of their army to Bahrain – and this is exactly how Netanyahu is explaining his demand to maintain control of the Jordan Valley and the ridges overlooking it, where the settlement of Itamar is located.

U.S. may talk with Hezbollah's political leadership

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The administration of U.S. President Barack Obama is considering reaching out to the political leadership in Hezbollah, the Washington Post reported on Friday, stressing that at this stage it was an intelligence effort, not a policymaking one.

In an opinion piece appearing on the newspaper's online edition, columnist David Ignatius indicated that Washington was considering an effort similar to the one the United Kingdom implemented "during the 1990s with Sinn Fein, the legal political wing of the terrorist Irish Republican Army.

"That outreach led to breakthrough peace talks and settlement of a conflict that had been raging for more than a century," Ignatius wrote, adding that several U.S. officials were expected to endorse dialogue with political elements of both Hezbollah and the Taliban in an upcoming intelligence report.

Writing of the effect recent Mideast turmoil may have had on Obama's decision to accept these recommendations, the Washington Post writer said that the "political time bomb ticking away in the [intelligence report] is the question of whether the United States should seek some kind of direct or indirect engagement with Hezbollah — at least with its political wing.

"Officials who support this course argue that the organization is like the IRA or the PLO — with non-military components that can be drawn into a dialogue," Ignatius added.

Ignatius quotes in his article one intelligence official, John Brennan, known for supporting a move toward dialogue with the Lebanese militant group, as saying that while "Hezbollah started out as purely a terrorist organization back in the early '80s," it has "evolved significantly over time."

"The bottom line," the Washington Post article concluded, "is that after a decade of American wars in the Middle East, the Obama administration is increasingly looking for ways to talk with adversaries and draw them into a process of dialogue.

"The world is changing, and perhaps so should U.S. policy," he added.

Bold change is an opportunity

Question: "How many congregants does it take to change a light bulb in a synagogue?" The answer is: "Change? You vant we should change the light bulb? My grandmother donated that light bulb!"

Change is never easy – personally or communally. Most of us like our lives, habits, institutions – or at least are so addicted to them we fear the unknown. As informal, democratic structures keeping our traditions alive, Jewish communities frequently resist change – even when they need it. And Jewish institutions are particularly loath to change themselves – particularly when they are still functional. Usually, we change when it is too late – failing to move deliberately ahead when strong and instead scrambling chaotically, reactively, when weak.

Gill Troy

in Montreal

Aware of the challenges in changing, the Montreal Jewish community has, nevertheless, bravely launched the unification of Jewish People's and Peretz Schools-Bialik and United Talmud Torahs/Herzliah into a new, innovative, centre of educational excellence to create Montreal's New Community School.

The visionaries behind the initiative understand the difficulties involved in combining two educational institutions, each with a proud past and distinct personality. The challenge is ensuring that 1 + 1 does not equal 1 – shrinking two institutions into a third, but to make 1 + 1 = 3, creating an institution that is bigger, better, bolder than the two were separately, when 1 + 1 only yielded 2.

The Montreal Jewish community needs a flagship school reflecting the character of Montreal's unique community. In the 20th century, Quebec's linguistic obsession yielded schools often defined by the languages they emphasized. A new school suited for the 21st century starts with the assumption that Jewish identity is about who we are not what language we speak. This school will reflect the central value of klal Yisrael, the unity of the Jewish People, that broad connection we feel one to another by sharing that noble title "Jew," while making them deep, passionate, literate Jewish patriots, committed to our shared sense of community with a common heritage and common values.

Simultaneously, we have diversity within the unity. The new school will accommodate – and nourish – different languages, different traditions, different levels of observance, different communities of origin – while maintaining high standards of excellence and a tone not just of mutual respect but of community solidarity. Students will go deep, reaching into the particular traditions, ideas and Jewish expressions they bring from home, that anchor them, while also going broad, weaving their particular thread of home heritage and observance into the rich communal tapestry that unites Montreal Jews – and Jews worldwide.

The phrase New Montreal Community School says it all. "New" – it will be cutting edge. "Montreal" – it will reflect Montreal's uniqueness as one of the most Jewishly literate, committed, activist, Zionist, multi-lingual, diverse communities in North America. "Community" – in an age of extreme individualism, disposable relationships, and the lure of the here and now, Judaism is about community, continuity, commitment – which cultivates and roots an individual. And "School" – by learning together, volunteering together, living together, students can benefit from the greater resources one thriving educational centre can offer while maintaining their particular identity. And in age of fragmentation, when everyone wants to know if you go to a Reform school or a Conservative school, if it is Ashkenazi or Sephardi, to be able to answer, "Yes, it is a community school," could be a great peoplehood platform, a great way of reminding us that the core values, the defining narrative, the central rituals, the rich civilization – the Montreal Jewish community – uniting us is more significant, resonant, lasting than whatever differences we might have.

Other communities have succeeded with community day schools – Boston, London and – dare we say it – Toronto. Montreal's time has now come to create this while preserving Montreal's special character.

Another light bulb joke: "How many Jews does it take to change a light bulb?" The answer: "30. One to change the bulb, and 29 to discuss it, yelling conflicting instructions to the person changing the bulb." This bold change is an opportunity to have a communal conversation about what community means, what Judaism means, and why we should send our children to Jewish day schools in the first place. Rather than staying on the sidelines complaining, parents, students and alumni should line up to help write this great new chapter in Montreal's history, saying, "Hineni, here I am, how can I help?"

Be happy (it's Adar again)

The Talmud, in Masechet Taanit 29, teaches that when the month Adar enters, joy increases! There's a question as to whether that's a statement of fact or a command to make it so. Either way, the month of Purim is supposed to be extra happy. This year is a leap year, so we get two Adars to be really happy. A quick explanation: since the Jewish year comprises 12 lunar months, it averages only 354 days (12x29.5). To bring it in sync with the seasons of the 365.25-day solar year, a leap year of 13 months is scheduled seven times in a 19-year cycle. The added month is always an Adar II, making this, the leap year Adar (including its Rosh Chodesh days) a 60-day affair of joy.

But we Jews are funny about happiness. We say, "Oy, I'm so happy I can plotz" or "I'm so happy I could cry." Some of us are most happy when we're miserable. We love aggravation! We live for tsuris. Happiness is so elusive. We walk toward it and see it from a distance, but we don't recognize it even when it falls in our laps. We chase this fat little mouse in whatever way we can, but we don't know what it is we're really trying to catch. How many of us know people who are really, really happy – existentially so, without the "I'd be happier if..." or the "I'll be happier when..." ?

It seems to me that we really don't need any more electronic gadgets or whatever else is on at the moment. What we need are happiness lessons. At life's supposedly happiest moments, many of us are too nervous or busy or thinking about something else to truly be happy. At a wedding, we worry about the caterer. At a family meal, there are little squabbles and petty arguments. When we go out to have "fun," we're aware of how much it costs. Our kids have "fun" by escaping into movies and video games that annoy us.

Several years ago, Dennis Prager wrote a thought-provoking article titled, "You Think You're Happy? Think Again." He noted, "I wonder whether people today are not actually being taught to feel unhappy... Is there anybody who couldn't be shown that he or she is capable of experiencing more joy in virtually every area of life?... The list of missed delights is endless."

No matter how good things get, they could always be better. It's rare that anyone says, "That's all the money I want. That's fine – I can stop making money now. " Or "that's all the kavod I want. I'm through. I don't want any more recognition." As Prager says, "There is never a point at which we will not want more. Never. Ask those with great wealth and great sex." What would the whole advertising industry do if we didn't want to have more, if we didn't feel unhappy with what we already have?

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

in Toronto

And if we only wanted to be happy, it should be easy. But we want to be happier than other people, which is always hard, because we imagine other people to be much happier than they are, and to be much happier than we could possibly ever be.

In the February issue of Toronto Life, editor Sarah Fulford discusses a newly released study by the Canadian Centre for the Study of Living Standards, which indicates, not surprisingly, that "income isn't the most important determinant of individual happiness... physical health and stress levels and even a sense of belonging matter more."

So let me tell you a secret. The point of Judaism isn't happiness, either, even in a leap year full of Adars. Maybe that's why we come away disappointed so much of the time in our Jewish lives. That's not to say Jewish events can't be fun or have joyful, joyous moments. They can and they should. But the point of living a Jewish life, ultimately, is to pursue meaning. Purim morphs into Pesach, a holiday filled with substance and significance, and a sense of belonging.

Adar lets us off easy, with graggers and masks and some schnapps. It's a fleeting sort of happy. But it's a kind of first baby step toward the spiritual depth that being really happy would demand.

An enduring political relationship

The monument strikes a first-time visitor to Guatemala City, a congested urban sprawl of unlovely low-rise buildings incongruously set off by gleaming glass-sheathed skyscrapers shaded by lush tropical vegetation. The golden Magen David, fabricated from metal, is more than 10 feet high and is supported by three brown rectangular blocks. Erected in 1997 to pay tribute to Israel and highlight Israel's enduring relationship with Guatemala, it is situated in a circular parkette in Zona 9, a fashionable neighbourhood in Central America's biggest city.

Sheldon Kirshner in Guatemala City

By coincidence, the city's only mosque, Mezquita De Aldaawa Islamica, an ornate yellow and white building protected by a high wall, stands just around the corner.

Political relationships come and go as national interests shift, but Israel's friendship with Guatemala – a nation of 13 million with a strong evangelical Christian streak and a tiny Jewish community, has stood the test of time.

"Our bilateral relations are excellent, not only because of the long history we've shared, but also because of our presence in Guatemala," said Israel's ambassador, Eliahu Lopez, a seasoned diplomat who took up his post in the summer of 2009.

In an unmistakable sign of the esteem in which Israel is generally held in this country, the National Congress, Guatemala's parliament, honoured the Jewish state shortly after Lopez's arrival in Guatemala City.

When two-thirds of the legislators in the National Congress expressed gratitude for Israel's contributions to Guatemala, Roberto Alejos, the Speaker, said, "If there is thriving agriculture, it's an Israeli contribution. If we have education, medicine and security, it's the Israelis who shared with us their rich experience."

In the wake of Alejos' speech, Lopez – who previously served in Venezuela, Germany, the Caribbean, Ethiopia, Paraguay and the former Czechoslovakia – was called to wave the Israeli flag in the centre of the chamber. Bowing his head in appreciation, Lopez thanked the National Congress for this signal honour, saying he felt national pride at a moment when Israel faced international difficulties following its invasion of the Gaza Strip.

He added, "Despite its political problems, Israel continues to share its experiences with friendly countries such as Guatemala."

Shortly afterward, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman phoned Guatemala's vice-president to thank him for the event.

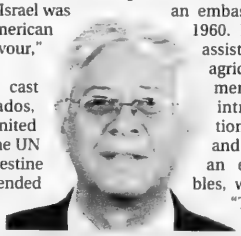
Even judged by the hard, unsentimental realities of Realpolitik, Israel can usually count on Guatemala, a nation whose historical narrative has been suffused with bloodshed and tragedy since winning independence from Spain in 1821.

A close U.S. ally for generations, Guatemala was one of 33 countries that voted for the Nov. 29, 1947, United Nations Palestine Partition Plan, which paved the way for Israel's creation less than a year later.

Guatemala was the first country in Latin America to come out in favour of partition during the roll call.

"Guatemala's support of Israel was a signal to other Latin American countries to vote in our favour," observed Lopez.

Guatemala's vote was cast by Jorge Garcia Granados, its ambassador to the United Nations and a member of the UN Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), which recommended partition.



Eliahu Lopez

Granados, who went on to become Guatemala's ambassador to Israel, wrote a book about his pivotal role in Israel's establishment, The Birth of Israel: The Drama As I Saw It, published in 1949 and sold by Amazon.com today.

The scion of an influential family, Granados had no previous involvement in Jewish or Arab affairs when the Palestine file was thrust on him. But in his memoir, he writes, "I felt great sympathy for the Jews as a result of the world war, felt great admiration for what I saw as Jewish development in basically what I viewed as a barren land."

He went on to voice disgust that the Palestinian Arabs had been under the sway of the Mufti of Jerusalem, who had allied himself with Nazi Germany and fascist Italy.

Granados' sentiments are doubtless sincere. But one can safely assume that U.S. pressure was a factor in Guatemala's decision to recognize Jewish statehood.

Nine other countries in Latin America – an American sphere of influence since the 1823 Monroe Doctrine – voted for the 1947 partition plan: Bolivia, Brazil, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay and Peru. Six Latin American nations – Argentina, Chile, Colombia, El Salvador, Honduras and Mexico – abstained. Only one Latin bloc country, Cuba, voted against the resolution.

There was perhaps another reason why Guatemala voted for Jewish statehood. The major stockholder in the United Fruit Company, a key player in Guatemala's agrarian-based economy, was Samuel Zemurray, a Russian-born American Jew and a staunch Zionist.

After winning statehood, Israel formed good relations with Guatemala, opening an embassy in Guatemala City in 1960. Israel offered Guatemala assistance in such vital fields as agriculture and water management. Indeed, Israeli experts introduced the drip irrigation technique to Guatemala and helped farmers develop an export trade in vegetables, watermelons and melons. "These products are today the major bulk exports of Guatemala to the United States," said Lopez, who marked his 65th birthday on March 10.

Israel has also sold military equipment to Guatemala, he noted.

When the United States cut off military aid to Guatemala in 1977 to protest human rights violations by Guatemalan government forces during the 36-year civil-war period, Israel stepped in to fill the gap.

Guatemala bought Galil rifles, Arava aircraft and computers. Guatemala also purchased Israeli armoured personnel carriers, Dabur-class patrol boats, machine guns and grenade launchers. Israeli advisers provided advice on counter-insurgency warfare.

Since the 1950s, more than 5,000 Guatemalans have gone to Israel for advanced training in security, rural development, agriculture, medicine and technology, while Israeli companies like Solel Boneh and H & C have built hydroelectric plants and highways, Lopez said. Guatemala, in league with Costa Rica and El Salvador, was one the first countries to transfer its embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Citing its "intimate relationship" with Israel, the then-Guatemalan president, Ramiro de Leon Carpio, announced the move in 1994, much to the surprise of his foreign minister. Arab countries responded by suspending purchases of Guatemalan cardamom, angering local farmers.

Since the Arab world bought 85 per cent of Guatemala's cardamom crop, the Guatemalan government backed down, moving its embassy back to Tel Aviv. "This was an act that Israel could not stop," said Lopez. "Guatemala had to follow the lead taken by all countries in Central America."

This glitch notwithstanding, Israel and Guatemala continue to be the best of friends.

Ordaining women not radical: rabbi

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Avi Weiss believes that the best dvar Torah a rabbi can give consists of "not so much what you say, but what you do."

Speaking at a Torah in Motion (TIM) program held March 13 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, Rabbi Weiss said he believes that non-violent civil disobedience is as important as quiet diplomacy.

A longtime activist – who became widely known for Soviet Jewry advocacy, and who suffered two heart attacks during protests and was arrested numerous times – he made headlines more recently for ordaining Rabba Sara Hurwitz, the first female to be ordained as an Orthodox spiritual leader, last year.

Rabbi Weiss – senior rabbi of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale and founder of the "open Orthodox" rabbinical school Yeshivat Chovevei Torah and its counterpart for women, Yeshivat Maharat – was interviewed by TIM co-founder Elliott Malamet in a program titled Activism and Advocacy: A Lifelong Commitment to the Jewish People.

The rabbi said he did not believe he was doing anything radical by ordaining Rabba Hurwitz, and added that he was surprised by the level of rhetoric that ensued.

He said he felt there had been an evolution in the Orthodox world over the past 100 years in terms of women and Jewish learning, citing the Chafetz Chaim's endorsement of women learning Torah, and the advanced Kolel program for women at Stern College. As well, he noted, women are now serving as yoatzot Halachah (halachic advisers) and in spiritual leadership positions in Orthodox synagogues.

"What I did that was different was to give it a title," Rabbi Weiss said. "That's where I took a step and went where others have not gone, but functionally, there literally was no difference."

He added that, for him, "rabba" is not the same as "rabbi." Orthodoxy is not egalitarian, he explained. "Ninety per cent of what a rabbi can do, women can do. A very significant 10 per cent, women can't do."

He noted, as well, that there are some things women can do as spiritual leaders that men cannot. Rabba Hurwitz can't be on a beit din for conversion, but she can counsel a woman who is converting and "literally" take her into the mikvah, Rabbi Weiss said. "That's a very powerful move, in my opinion.

"We desperately need spiritual leadership," he added. "For me, to limit spiritual leadership to 50 per cent of the pool doesn't make sense."

Rabbi Weiss, who was born in 1944 and ordained by Yeshiva University in 1966, attended a haredi school as a youngster and also studied at Yeshivat Kerem B'Yavneh in Israel.

His first pulpit, a year-long stint in St. Louis, was "the first time a yeshiva boy was seeing the real world," he said.

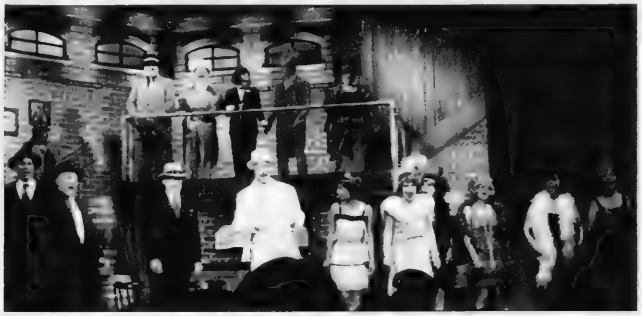
The rabbi credits his Polish-born father – who was raised a Chassid and went on to become a rabbi at Yeshiva University – for instilling in him "a sense of Jewish activism." However, he said, it took time to manifest.

Although Rabbi Weiss was involved in the Soviet Jewry movement early in his career in the 1960s, he was not yet attending rallies. "I feel somewhat shamed that I was not out there protesting with them."

At one time, he added, he was also "very inspired" by Rabbi Meir Kahane, founder of the extremist Kach party and the Jewish Defence League. They "broke on a variety of issues," Rabbi Weiss said – to the extent that the two were scheduled to debate on the night that followed Rabbi Kahane's assassination in 1990.

Rabbi Weiss founded Chovevei Torah in large part because of "a precipitous move to the right" in Orthodoxy.

"There is latitude and flexibility" in Halachah, but within parameters, he said.



Beth Tzedec's annual Purim play, themed the Roaring 20s' includes a cast of over 50 singers, dancers and actors, ranging in age from 8 to 77-years.

Purim play transforms participants' lives

Compiled by CJN Staff

A 12-year-old girl, who could barely utter her own name because she was so painfully insecure after being bullied at school, sang and danced centre stage with confidence.

A cancer survivor with a prosthetic throat, who courageously auditioned to be a backup dancer, did the unthinkable when she performed a vocal solo.

A widow in her 70s who was a shut-in for a year following her husband's death rediscovered her zest for life when she joined an unlikely ensemble of non-professional actors that became an inspiring, new-found family.

These are just some of the stories of the members of Beth Tzedec Congregation who performed in the synagogue's annual Purim Family Musical on March 17 and 20. The musical has been sold out every year since its inception six years ago.

The event has transformed the lives of those who have volunteered to participate in this musical extravaganza.

"The camaraderie among the cast is awe-inspiring. They invest hundreds of hours rehearsing. A professional orchestra, spectacular sets and elaborate costumes culminate in a superior musical production beyond compare," said Cantor Simon Spiro, who produced and directed this year's musical in collaboration with his wife, Aliza, an award-winning songwriter.

This year's theme was the Roaring Twenties – complete with flappers, machine-gun-wielding bad guys, a spirited speakeasy and a shvitz, where Mordechai sweats to the oldies, a musical number choreographed to the famous 1920s tune Puttin' On The Ritz.

The cast of more than 50 singers, dancers and actors, ranging in age from 8 to 77, included entrepreneurs, dentists, accountants, marketers, bankers, lawyers, engineers, teachers, and even rabbis, former synagogue presidents and maintenance staff.

COR fights Passover inflation as it educates

Jennifer M. MacLeod
Special to the CJN

"Can you say mashgiach?" The COR's Rabbi Tsvi Heber is standing in front of a group of middle-school students at the Village Shul Hebrew School. On this chilly evening, he is Mister Kosher, tossing out Post-It notes and pens for every correct answer.

Rabbi Tavi Heber

"And who's the rabbi who slaughters the animals? The sho-" – a student calls out "shofar," but Rabbi Heber gently offers "shochet."

From classroom visits to synagogue forums, supermarket tours and even koshering home kitchens, the Council of Orthodox Rabbis' educational and outreach services are expanding as it positions itself to become the friendly face of kashrut in Toronto.

"What do we check an egg for?" Rabbi Heber asks the class.

"There might be an omelette inside!" shouts one student.

"Poison!" calls another.

Joking aside, the kids are fascinated. Few consumers know exactly what kashrut agencies do. Many assume they just look at ingredient lists and supply a symbol for packaging.

With Rabbi Heber at its helm, COR in the community is all about proving that keeping kosher at home doesn't have to be difficult – or expensive, for example, with this year's brand-new Passover pricing initiative.

This year for the first time, several divisions of COR (the hechsher of the Kashruth Council of Toronto) have come together under the leadership of Rabbi Yacov Felder in a four-fold approach to keeping food costs down: educating consumers about items that don't require Passover supervision (they can be purchased at regular prices); working with retailers to minimize costs at Passover; initiating dialogue with wholesalers; and getting the message out to synagogue leadership in the Orthodox community.

Rabbi Felder understands the scope of his undertaking and admits this "isn't just a one-year project."

Some savings may be immediate. From mouthwash to juice to dishwasher detergent, what goes into your mouth or onto your plates doesn't always need expensive Passover certification. This year's Passover Guide, available online and from COR, contains an expanded list of these and other categories where regular products may be used during Passover.

On the retail front, COR will "identify areas where prices seem to be inflated [and] seek the root cause," whether wholesaler, manufacturer or both. "If we can keep prices down, it will be good for the retailer" because customers may start buying kosher year-round, spreading out the profits, Rabbi Felder says.

He is aware that there may be resistance. Passover is retailers' busiest season, and many feel they must mark up prices to make money. Rabbi Felder admits that slightly higher prices may be justified by additional labour and inventory, "however, it doesn't justify a major hike.

"Contrary to popular belief," he says, "kashrut fees are not what cause [prices] to go up," since establishments under COR pay the same amount for full-time kosher supervision year-round. "We'd like it to be a positive message."

COR also seeks ongoing dialogue with consumers and community leaders about Pesach pricing, Rabbi Felder says, not because "we have control... but we do have some sway, and we'd like to bring this issue to the forefront."

Back in Rabbi Heber's classroom, he's polling the kids about junk food: "Which chips do you like best?"

"Can I have two favourites?" one calls out.

It's late, and talking about food is distracting, but they're still asking questions: "Is all water kosher?" "If water had bugs in it, would it still be kosher?"

Bugs have become a popular topic, given recent infestations of the nearly-invisible critters that can render even the most kosher strawberry inedible. In-home demonstrations are a great way to learn more, Rabbi Heber says. "We can actually stand around a kitchen island with a lightbox and a sink and discuss how to check and wash fruits and vegetables thoroughly."

But produce doesn't only mean bugs: "We had a class... on fruits and vegetables coming from Israel... encouraging people to buy them and educating them in how to deal with them [halachically, separating Torah-mandated tithes] at the same time." Programs are also available on kosher alcohol, separating challah and many more: there is hardly a food-related topic COR won't come talk about.

Lebovic Campus receives $15 million boost from federal government

Funds to help build phase 3 of project including theatre, outdoor pool

By Barbra Green

Construction on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus ground to a halt on the morning of March 14th.

For one hour, the site was still as the Honourable Julian Fantino, Minister of State for Seniors and Member of Parliament for Vaughan, announced a $15 million contribution by the Government of Canada to Phase 3 of the Lebovic Campus.

"Our government remains focused on the economy which is why we are proud to invest in this local infrastructure project that will create jobs, strengthen Vaughan's economy and improve the quality of life of all York Region families well into the future," said Fantino.

The Phase 3 project, at the corner of Bathurst Street and Lebovic Campus Drive, includes a conference and celebration pavilion and atrium, a theatre and lecture hall, an outdoor pool, as well as a number of multi-purpose programming and meeting facilities that will be available to all citizens of York Region. Construction of Phase 2 is already well underway, and will feature the incredible Schwartz/Reisman Centre, home to two indoor pools, a fitness and conditioning centre, daycare and preschool, and a community arts centre.

Elizabeth Wolfe, Chair of the Board, UJA Federation, thanked Minister Fantino for the government's generous support of one of Canada's fastest growing communities, and reflected on Jewish Toronto's proud past and bright future.

"The story of Toronto's Jewish community, in many ways reflects the narrative of our great nation. Canada is a country built on the hopes and dreams of those searching for a better life for themselves and their families," said Wolfe. "In Canada, we found safety and success; opportunity and acceptance. We found a place to put down roots and build community. And today, as you see all around you, that building continues."

"Through UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, we are following in the footsteps of the visionaries who came before us; the men and women who planned and built for generations to come," said Wolfe. "Today, through projects such as the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus we continue to build not only stronger communities, but stronger Canadians as well."

The Lebovic Campus is one of three exciting centres of Jewish life being built as part of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign. The $400 million capital endeavour, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum, with leadership at the Cabinet level by Leslie Gales, also includes the midtown Sherman Campus at Bathurst and Sheppard, and the Miles Nadal JCC and Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life in the downtown district. With the support of all three levels of government and numerous Jewish community philanthropists, $300 million has already been raised.

Maurizio Bevilacqua, Mayor of the City of Vaughan, also addressed the chilly but cheerful audience which included representatives from many of the community agencies and partners that will form the fabric of the Lebovic Campus. He spoke of the city's support for this "world-class" campus from the beginning, more than a decade ago, when the now prime 50-acres was just farmland and a dream.

"Today, we not only celebrate community building, not only do we celebrate the great achievements of the Jewish community here in the city of Vaughan and beyond, but I do believe that today is a day when we truly celebrate nation building," said Bevilacqua.

It was a sentiment echoed by Ted Sokolsky, President and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"This is one of those great moments that we can celebrate – as citizens of Vaughan, as citizens of Ontario, and as proud Canadians – what we can achieve when we work together," said Sokolsky.

"Those who believe in the future, help build the future. And all of you here today - especially our representatives of government – they believe in the future, they are creating the future, and it has been our honour and pleasure to be their partners in this city building."

Where it all began

Construction and funding take the headlines today, but the story of the Lebovic Campus dates back more than a decade. Without the vision and imagination of men such as Leo Goldhar, current Chair of the Campus Management Committee, and Lou Greenbaum (pictured l-r) the 50-acre site on Bathurst north of Rutherford Road might still be farmland. In the year 2000, these Tomorrow Campaign pioneers helped to find and acquire the land where the Lebovic Campus now stands.

We've seen the past, and it works

Rabbi Philip S. Scheim

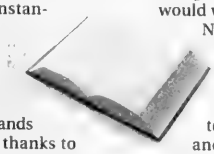
Best Buy, the technology superstore, offers in its U.S. stores a new program called "Buy Back," through which customers purchase a plan to sell back their computers, cellphones, televisions and other electronics when a new version of the product is introduced. "Future-proof your technology," the promotion encourages, recognizing that electronics become outmoded and undesirable moments after their removal from the packaging, at the current lightning-fast cycle of technology upgrades.

Contrast this with the visit of the late New York Times senior editor James Reston to Communist China 40 years ago. During his trip, he underwent an emergency appendectomy. Following the surgery, he was treated with acupuncture for pain management, a therapy largely unknown in the west at the time. Upon his return to New York, he wrote about his experience and introduced his readers to acupuncture, saying: "I've seen the past, and it works!"

The Torah reading of Shemini introduces us to kashrut, the Jewish dietary code, which continues to influence millions of Jewish lives today, as it has done for millennia. On a daily basis, we can say that we have seen the past, and it works. This ancient code, perhaps more than anything else, has preserved Jewish distinctiveness, thus helping to prevent our dissolution into surrounding cultures.

This is not to suggest that we're not enticed by the Best Buy campaign, that state-of the art technology doesn't interest us. Indeed, as these words are typed on my MacBook Pro, I have instantaneous access to thousands of classic Judaic texts, thanks to Bar-Ilan University, and many other religious Jewish sources of electronic learning. At the very time when we can say that we have seen the past by studying texts that take us back through the accumulated centuries of Jewish wisdom, we welcome the cutting edge of technology, which helps us access more and more of our past in as efficient and all-encompassing a way as possible.

Rabbinic Reflections



When Eliezer Ben Yehudah arrived in Jaffa 130 years ago, he instructed his family members that they were permitted to speak only Hebrew at home. In so doing, he transformed them into the first modern-Hebrew-speaking family in history and set the stage for the revival of Hebrew as a spoken language and the language of the Jewish state. He understood that the past would work, that our ancient language would become our stepping-stone into modernity.

Not long thereafter, Theodor Herzl would write Altneuland (Old-New Land), rendered in Nahum Sokolov's Hebrew translation as Tel Aviv – combining tel, an archeological term calling to mind an ancient civilization, and aviv, meaning spring, signifying rebirth and renewal. The first modern Jewish city and the language spoken in its streets both powerfully reflect the strength that we continually derive from our deepest historical roots.

Indeed, we have seen the past, and it works.

Connection between leaders, people is crucial

Rosh Chodesh Nisan is around the corner, and it carries significance in and of itself. On the first of Nisan, Israel inaugurated Aaron's family as priests and the Tabernacle, the Mishkan, as holy space. But it is also on the first of Nisan that two of Aaron's sons, Nadav and Avihu, perish suddenly for bringing strange fire before God.

While the priesthood designates a societal hierarchy within Israel, it does not represent absolute power. The tragic reality of Nadav and Avihu is that they did not adhere to the strict laws of ritual. A priest, facilitating the spiritual ritual of someone from Israel, cannot get creative. The ritual is a dialogue between a person and God. The priest is there to know the laws and perform the ritual meticulously, but he must never overstep.

One of the challenges of Jewish leadership is to continuously value the congregation of Israel. That does not mean value them in a conceptual way but in a very real way. In other words, you cannot spend every day studying the laws and values of the Torah and scorn the Jewish community that tries to live them.

All too often in today's world we encounter someone who makes a derogatory remark about Jews and then follows it with: 'It's okay, I'm Jewish'. Somehow self-mocking is acceptable, while the same statement said of another would be deemed racist.

The Jewish model is to value both the leader and the society as needing each other. People are likely to forget what was learned by rote but will remember what they did or where they were when they learned it. It's known as the "tip of my tongue" phenomenon. I remember everything but what I need.

Midrashic Moments
Rachel Turkienicz

The great sages of Israel show us examples of this symbiotic relationship. In the Talmud, it speaks of an event in Nisan. The leadership of that time couldn't remember a detail of the law and were told of this great scholar named Hillel. Hillel was brought to them and remembered not only the law but also how to have deduced that law if he weren't there. As Hillel is speaking with everyone, he begins to scold the people for not learning enough from their leaders.

No sooner does Hillel finish berating the community when he is asked whether or not a person can carry a knife on Shabbat if he forgot to bring it in the night before. Hillel responds by saying he remembers learning that law, but he cannot now remember what it says. His solution is to go outside and watch the people, the everyman. He instructs the leaders to always depend on the people who may not have studied the law but have devoted themselves to shaping their lives around it.

It is easy for leaders of a people to feel disconnected from the people themselves. As one rabbi once mentioned, it's hard for rabbis to make friends. And yet our texts tell us that the connection between the leaders and the people is crucial to the process.

In the month of Nisan, we inaugurate our priesthood and we lose two young priests who overstepped. We need our ritual leaders to be strict in their facilitation and they need us to make our Judaism a natural part of our actions. It is that mutual need and respect that should define every Jewish community.

Jews, Italians commemorate their friendship

A while back I wrote about a project that I became involved in with the consul general of Italy, Gianni Bardini. It was Bardini who told me how impressed he was by the close relationship that our two communities have developed here in Toronto. He was moved to tears when he heard the story of Miriam Frankel, a young Italian Jewish girl from the city of Trieste who was deported to Auschwitz.

It was these events that led Bardini to wish to do something to commemorate, on an ongoing basis, the warm, cordial and mutually beneficial relationship between the Jewish and Italian communities. As president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, I have been fortunate enough to become the facilitator of this exciting venture. The participants include Amir Gissin, consul general of Israel in Toronto; the Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as the Goggio Chair of Italian Studies, located at St. Michael's College at University of Toronto.

As the opening salvo in our project, we are bringing in Edward Goldberg, the founder of the Medici Archive Project, the Italian equivalent of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Cairo Genizah combined. (The Cairo Genizah is a collection of almost 280,000 Jewish manuscript fragments found in the genizah, or storeroom, of Ben Ezra Synagogue in Fustat, now Old Cairo, Egypt.) The Medici Archive Project is a treasure-trove of information about the Renaissance.

It was the Medici family who, as merchant princes and patrons of the arts, played a pivotal role in this great age.

Past Forward

Alex Gropper

The archives contain more than a million documents, of which, amazingly, 60,000 deal with the Jews of Tuscany. I thought that highlighting our work together in one of the great ages of the past would be a wonderful way to introduce our project. (Goldberg speaks at 6:30 p.m. on April 27 at the Italian Cultural Institute, 420 Huron St.)

Gissin was the one who came up with a contemporary event to promote our project. He has arranged for a basketball game between the national teams of Israel and Italy to be held at the Air Canada Centre.

Despite these two wonderful events, we still did not have something that we could support on an ongoing basis to commemorate the friendship of our two communities. At our meetings, we were unable to come up with an ongoing project worthy of our support. Then, out of the blue, I received an e-mail from Michael Chazan, the director of the Archaeology Centre at U of T.

Chazan asked for my help in getting U of T involved in an archeological excavation in Israel. Then the name of an archeological site hit me – this is exactly what we had been looking for. It's called Tel Huqoq and dates to the Roman period, has a synagogue and is mentioned in the Christian Bible.

Bardini was as excited as I was about the idea. When we met with Gissin, he shared our enthusiasm and offered his hearty endorsement. It's great to know that I had hit a home run. We now need assistance in helping to raise the necessary funds.

Charoset: nuts, mortar and love

It may not have the fame of matzah. Or the kick of a mouthful of maror. But charoset, that lively mixture of nuts and wine and apple, plays a delicious role as we eat our way through the seder. As well, charoset is chock-full of symbolism about the Exodus, and even about love in the most desperate of times.

Unlike matzah and maror, charoset is not mentioned in the Torah. There is, however, a discussion in the Mishnah about whether eating it at a seder is a mitzvah – or just an efficient way to blunt the sharp taste of the maror, which is dipped into the nutty concoction. That dipping is alluded to in the third question of Mah Nishtana. [http://bit.ly/charos2]

The best known reason for charoset is found in the Talmud that says that it's made with ginger and cinnamon to represent the mortar, clay and straw that the Israelite slaves used to construct buildings. [http://bit.ly/charos1]

"I always was a charoset kid," recalls Steve Cohen. "It was really charoset that I loved... my mother's... Just finely chopped apples, sweet red wine and finely chopped walnuts. My only problem with charoset was that it didn't remind me of mortar, no matter how much I stretched my imagination." Read on to find out whether Cohen – now Rabbi Cohen of Congregation B'nai B'rith in Santa Barbara, Calif. – ever resolved his dilemma and what he told his congregants. [http://bit.ly/charos3]

Making the connection between charoset and bricks wasn't a stretch for Joseph Joel. Joel was a 19-year-old private serving in the 23rd Ohio Volunteer Infantry in the 1880s when he found himself trying to observe Passover. Thanks to "Yankee ingenuity... we obtained two kegs of cider, a lamb, several chickens, and some eggs. Horseradish or parsley we could not obtain, but in lieu we found a weed, whose bitterness, I apprehend, exceeded anything our forefathers 'enjoyed.'"

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

But as Joel explains, "The necessaries for the choroutzes we could not obtain, so we got a brick, which, rather hard to digest, reminded us, by looking at it, for what purpose it was intended." [http://bit.ly/charos4]

Aside from just eating it, charoset has become part of the seder ritual for some Jews. As the evening concludes, some Sephardim take charoset and place it in five places around the home to symbolize the khamsah – God's protective hand of five fingers. [http://bit.ly/charos5]

And what's the connection between charoset and love? As explained at momentmag.com, according to Rabbi Akiva, "charoset is a reminder of the Egyptian apple orchards where Hebrew women secretly made love to their husbands and bore children, thus defying the pharaoh's ban on procreation. Rabbi Akiva says that Israel was delivered from slavery in Egypt because of these 'righteous women's deeds.' His inspiration is the verse from the Song of Songs recited on the Sabbath of Passover week: 'Under the apple trees, I roused you. It was there your mother conceived you.'" [http://bit.ly/charos6]

Next week we sample charoset recipes: traditional, exotic and modern.

Jewish communities urged to fight Israeli boycott

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

One of Israel's foremost tacticians fighting the global anti-Israel boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement says it's time for Jewish communities worldwide to join in the battle.

DJ (David) Schneeweiss, Israel's former deputy ambassador in China, who is now a representative of the Foreign Ministry, co-ordinates Israel's anti-boycott strategy. He spoke with The CJN earlier this month while on a visit to Toronto.

DJ (David) Schneeweiss

Schneeweiss said it's important for people to know that the movement is not something being driven by any one group or central command post.

"It's not just someone sitting in Tehran saying, 'OK, now we're going to activate this [BDS] cell on this campus.' It's students and people getting brought into this thing which has a life of its own now," he said.

Schneeweiss added that BDS organizers dress up their cause by attempting "to own the most powerful terms of the western lexicon. Words like 'human rights,' 'war crimes,' 'apartheid' and 'justice'... are terribly powerful terms."

So when BDS organizers cloak themselves in these terms, they're able to connect with and "mobilize or at least make themselves more conceptually available to ordinary people," he said.

While Diaspora communities have been dealing with the BDS campaigns for years now, Schneeweiss said domestically, Israelis are finally starting to understand the scale of it.

"Israeli media tends to play up the movement such that Israelis begin to think that the whole world is against them," he said. "And while there is, I think, a distorted view of this phenomenon in Israel, we have to remember that there is a hostile campaign against Israel and we do well to be aware of it."

There is a positive side to it all though: rebuking the BDS movement has given Israel and Diaspora communities more common cause and is strengthening the relationship between the communities, he said.

Schneeweiss also had words of hope for Zionists who fear the BDS wave cannot be effectively countered because they are seemingly outnumbered.

"Numbers don't have to work against us, because the same tools are available to [pro-Israel] activists. Ordinary people can be involved in promoting Israel. That's how the other side is doing it," he said.

"It's not that difficult to be empowered. Information is available on anything and everything. Knowledge is power – all you have to do is build a community around that."

He said from Israel's point of view, one of the lucky things about the BDS movement is that it's a "completely zero-sum agenda."

The BDS movement is "completely out of synch" with dominant western values, he said, even though it seeks to portray itself as part of this value system.

"They're against dialogue, reconciliation, engagement and working together. They're even against having a conversation. They talk about blacklisting Israelis for being Israeli, in not having academic exchange in any shape or form. They talk about not allowing cultural icons, who may be critical or not, from coming to Israel.

"So all we have to do is own these values – engagement, reconciliation, dialogue – ourselves. Our people can fight the good fight with good ideas and the truth."

Schneeweiss believes that as long as Israel doesn't lose sight of its national goals, then it will naturally succeed in countering the BDS campaign.

He cited Israel's recent decision to apply for membership in the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) – it was granted membership in May 2010 – as "the right thing to do" both for political reasons and economic objectives to harmonize Israel's legislation with other economic world powers.

"That is a great response to the BDS agenda, which seeks to untether us [from the community of nations]. But we didn't do it [join the OECD] because of BDS, we did it because it was the right thing to do for Israel."

As for the BDS's impact on Israel, on the whole the results of the campaign have been something short of stellar, he said.

"If you look at the 'success' in the inverted commas of the BDS movement, they haven't achieved any kind of economic effect whatsoever [on Israel] nor have they achieved any practical boycotts. There are no declared boycotts by any serious pension funds or institutions that these guys have tried to target.

"But what they are trying to do is create the image of Israel being boycotted and of being an apartheid state. Because if they do, they know ordinary people will do the math [and conclude] 'if Israel is an apartheid state and being boycotted by so many people, then maybe I should join that movement, too.'"

'BIG Day' to buy Israeli products set for March 30

'We need to show boycotters their efforts are doomed'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

A Los Angeles-based organization is calling on supporters of the State of Israel to head out to their local malls and grocery stores on March 30 and go shopping.

Celebrating Israel and purchasing everything with a "made in Israel" label on it can serve as an antidote to an international boycott campaign being pushed by a coalition of anti-Israel organizations, said StandWithUs, a 10-year-old pro-Israel NGO. The group, which has chapters in several American cities, the United Kingdom and Israel, is urging schools, synagogues, community organizations and individuals to participate in its BIG (Buy Israeli Goods) Day.

Roz Rothstein

"We need to show the boycotters that their efforts are doomed. Let the boycotters know that when they call for boycotts of even one or two stores or products, they will face a much larger movement to buy Israeli goods," said StandWithUs co-founder and CEO Roz Rothstein.

"We are telling people to go to their local stores, request the exact Israeli products being targeted and buy them out. Let store managers know they should keep Israeli products well stocked on the shelves."

Opponents of Israel are promoting a very different message. Groups like End the Occupation and CODEPINK are asking shoppers to avoid Israeli products. They are also calling on their sympathizers to push for a divestment from Israel as well as a boycott of academic and cultural exchanges.

The March 30 date corresponds to Palestinian Land Day, when six Arab Israelis were killed in 1976 during protests against government confiscation of land. According to the Global BDS (boycott, divestment and sanctions) Movement website, "the BDS national committee (BNC) is calling on you to unite in your different capacities and struggles to join the Global BDS Day of Action on Land Day, 30 March 2011, in solidarity with the Palestinian people's right to self determination on their ancestral land."

Originally launched in 2005 by a number of Palestinian organizations and controlled through the national committee, the effort has gone international. The BDS website features video of past protests in England, Spain, Sweden and Canada. Protesters, employing street theatre, song and dance, have targeted Toronto's Mountain Equipment Co-op for stocking Israeli-made merchandise and Chapters Indigo, for the support of "lone soldiers" by Chapters principals Gerry Schwartz and Heather Reisman. Protesters have also targeted the Aroma Espresso Bar, a franchise of an Israeli-based cafe chain.

StandWithUs believes far more people support retailers who stock Israeli products than those who want a boycott. On Nov. 30, 2010, Rothstein noted, protesters in Brooklyn, N.Y., stood outside a large pharmacy and urged shoppers to avoid Israeli products. StandWithUs, in conjunction with the American-Israel Chamber of Commerce, countered the boycott by mobilizing supporters to enter the store and purchase every Israel-made product they could find.

"Delighted store managers said it was their best shopping day and promised to keep their shelves stocked with the targeted products," StandWithUs stated in a news release.

A similar tactic has been used in Toronto. Before Passover two years ago, Not in Our Name, a small Jewish group that supports a boycott, marched outside a downtown LCBO. Dozens of Israel supporters, responding to a mobilization effort co-ordinated by the Canada-Israel Committee's (CIC) Buycott Israel program, countered that demonstration by purchasing the store's entire inventory of 150 cases of Israeli wine. Last October, when protesters demonstrated at Aroma's Bloor Street cafe, sources told The CJN there was no effect on its business.

Sara Saber-Freedman, CIC's executive vice-president, said "buycott" campaigns originated in Canada and have spread worldwide. "The broad concept is that the power of the pocketbook counters the boycott effort. The message needs to be that when you target Israeli goods for boycott, the consequence will be more sales, not less.

"It flips the effort to delegitimize Israel from something that is negative for Israel and attaches a negative consequence to boycotters – the opposite of what was intended."

The CIC fully supports the StandWithUs campaign, Saber-Freedman said.

Rothstein said opponents of the boycott can visit http://www.buyisraelgoods.org for information about Israeli consumer products available by region. The site's Canadian section lists 22 categories of merchandise from baby and child apparel to women's swimming attire. Dozens of merchants in the Toronto area are cited, along with several in other cities including Vancouver and Montreal.

Rothstein believes the boycott effort has backfired. "I believe they think they are making a difference. Really, what they are accomplishing with their hostile campaign is to coalesce the pro-Israel, pro-peace community into doing counter-campaigns. It becomes clear, when they do these flash mob dances at stores, that they do not advocate peaceful coexistence. They do this because it's their way of going on the attack and working to isolate and demonize Israel," she said.

Puppeteer donates collection to Heschel School

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Meshka the Kvetch, Shlemiel, Shayna Blumka, the rabbi, and baby Heshele Peshele have a new home as of last week.

The (almost) life-size puppets were created by set designer Joanna Dabrowski and are part of the collection that storyteller and puppeteer Leslie Robbins-Conway has donated to the Toronto Heschel School.

Robbins-Conway, a founder of Jewish Storytelling Arts in Toronto, has lived in Owen Sound, Ont., for the past 11 years. She visited the school last Friday morning to perform for students, all of whom were in costume for Purim.

The puppets and props will be displayed and used, Heschel principal Gail Baker told The CJN.

Robbins-Conway, a teacher by training, has been a professional storyteller for more than 30 years. Her performances also draw on her musical and vocal training.

These days, she and her partner, Paul Conway, put on "country supper storytelling concerts," including one that is Shabbat-themed. As well, Robbins-Conway teaches at Owen Sound's Beth Ezekiel Synagogue.

Robbins-Conway had been looking to donate her collection, but nothing seemed like an ideal fit, until she saw an edition of the Lola Stein Institute's Think magazine that arrived as an insert in The Canadian Jewish News a few months ago. The institute was started in association with the school.

The issue of the magazine happened to be about using arts in the school, Robbins-Conway recalled.

At her performance for junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten and Grade 1 students, Robbins-Conway – aided by the puppets and her friend, Ann Thomas – performed Meshka The Kvetch, a cautionary tale about a woman who complains so much that people start to avoid her and her exaggerated descriptions began to become reality.

"That is totally the funniest," whispered one young child.

Robbins-Conway also narrated a story acted by Baker and facilities manager Greg Austin for the younger children, and she performed for older students later in the morning.

Judith Leitner, Heschel's director of arts, said the school already has a lot of puppets because of its arts-based learning. "We use the puppets to help teach," she said. "It creates a whole different learning environment."

The gift from Robbins-Conway is "a huge honour," she added.

Toronto congregation marks 50th year in Jerusalem

More than 200 former members have made aliyah since 1961

Jenny Hazan
CJN Israel Bureau

More than 200 former members of Toronto's Congregation Bnai Torah have moved to Israel since the synagogue was established in 1961.

Some of them gathered at the Shimon Hatzaddik Synagogue in Jerusalem on March 12 to reunite with current synagogue members, 35 of whom had just wrapped up a tour of Israel on the occasion of the synagogue's 50th anniversary.

Feature

From Feb. 20 to March 3, the mission toured the country, visiting the reconstructed Hurva Synagogue in the Old City, which was destroyed by the Jordanians in 1948; the synagogue in Zippori, site of Rabbi Yehuda Hanasi's editing of the Mishnah, and Tunisian Synagogue Ohr Torah in Acco. The reunion party in Jerusalem was the high point of the group's 10-day mission.

"The atmosphere is electric," said 50th anniversary celebration chair Jack Kahn at the reunion. "People are coming tonight that we haven't seen in 20 or 30 years, all of them hugging and kissing each other. It's an unbelievable experience."

A past president of Bnai Torah, located on Patricia Avenue, Kahn has been a member for the last 42 years.

The reunion was equally emotional for former synagogue members who reside in Israel, including Yehuda Poch, director of communications at One Family Fund, the Jerusalem-based organization dedicated to helping Israel's victims of terror.

Poch made aliyah in 1997, at the age of 26, ending a 20-year membership to Bnai Torah. His three brothers and parents followed him. He was pleasantly surprised to find a huge photograph of him and one of his brothers in the synagogue's foyer on the night of the reunion.

Poch said the photo took him back to 1980, when he was nine years old, the year the synagogue bought a block of Toronto Blue Jays tickets and he and his brother won a stadium tour. The photo was taken on the field, by a professional photographer.

"That's the kind of place it was," recalled Poch. "Not many shuls would have the idea to get a bunch of baseball tickets and take the congregation to a baseball game together. It's one of my fondest memories."

Poch remembers the synagogue's annual picnic with fondness. "The entire membership showed up," he said. "It was the most fun thing people could look forward to the whole year."

Former member Jonah Pressman also has happy childhood memories of Bnai Torah. He joined the shul as an 11-year-old in the mid-1970s, when his family moved from Montreal to Toronto. He was a member until he made aliyah four years ago.

This is a community of very devoted people. They are devoted to the needs of the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and they are committed to Jewish values

"I had my bar mitzvah in the shul and so did my two sons," said Pressman, who now lives in Beit Shemesh. The reunion was a great opportunity not only to meet with current members on tour but also to meet with former members now living in Israel, he said.

"We usually only see each other when someone from the synagogue passes away and we meet at the funeral. This time we got together for a phenomenal simchah. It was great!"

Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky

Poch and Pressman are in good company among former Bnai Torah members who came to Israel. They include the late Henry Weinberg, the only Canadian Jew who was a member of the Knesset; David Weinberg, director of the Israel office of the Canada-Israel Committee, and two of the shul's former leaders, Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, brother of former British Chief Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits, and Rabbi Sholom Gold, who now serves as rabbi emeritus at one of the largest shuls in Har Nof and as dean of the Avrom Silver Jerusalem College for Adults.

What accounts for the number of of synagogue Bnai Torah members who have made aliyah? David Woolf, co-chair of the mission and longtime shul member, said that "somehow, without preaching or promoting, we have a large population that moved here.

"[The synagogue] was just such a wonderful place to bring up children," said Woolf, who has two children and four of his 13 grandchildren living in Israel. "It was very accepting. There was a tremendous amount of chesed and open homes. It was welcoming and giving, and fostered a positive attitude toward both Judaism and Israel."

The community atmosphere can be credited in part to the influence of the synagogue's longtime Rabbi Raphael Marcus, who died of cancer in 2007 after serving as Bnai Torah's leader for 27 years.

"But it wasn't just [his] leadership," Poch said. "The members of the synagogue were [always] geared toward religious Zionism."

Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky, who became the leader of Bnai Torah about a year ago, concurred. "This is a community of very devoted people. They are devoted to the needs of the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and they are committed to Jewish values," says Rabbi Milevsky, who participated in the mission. "It is a privilege and an honour for me to join this community."

While members are proud of the synagogue's aliyah record, it is a double-edged sword. The challenge now facing the community is its dwindling membership, particularly of young families.

Bnai Torah's membership has declined from 350 families at its height to 200 to 250 in recent years. The community is taking measures – including mortgage assistance, get-togethers and rabbi's classes – to attract new young families to replace those who have moved to Israel.

Although Woolf acknowledges the importance of attracting new members, he said, "I think we did a better thing by building up Israel."

Pressman, who said he wanted to make aliyah since he was seven years old, agrees. "Our success is our failure and vice versa. Our failure to keep young people [in the shul] is our success in getting them to move to Israel. We're building a home, and this [Israel] is our future."

Debbie Wasserman, co-chair with Karen Fenwick, of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section's Passover food drive, has been working on this year's drive since the last one ended.

Debbie Wasserman, co-chair, 2011 Passover food drive stands with Matzah Man, Gabriel Bernard, 13.

"There is always follow-up. It never just ends," said Wasserman, who works on the drive, now in its 28th year, three days a week year-round.

Last year, they delivered boxes, which include many of the essentials needed for the seder and for the week of Passover, to more than 10,000 recipients, she said.

"There are so many people who need help. I want to spread the word so that Toronto Jews will worry about those who are in need."

To help spread that word about this year's drive, which officially began on March 23, she's asked volunteers to stand outside various supermarkets and in front of Council House at 4700 Bathurst St., in two costumes they've had made up for the drive, a matzah man and a matzah baker. "I just want to attract attention," Wasserman said.

"Many people in the community don't realize there are so many families, especially the working poor, who can't afford Passover food. These include recent immigrants, single mothers and those with disabilities. Recipients are all referred by an agency, rabbi or doctor."

When kids go out with their parents on delivery day – this year it is April 10 – "their eyes are opened. They meet people who are thankful for anything they can get, and they learn that there are Jews living in real poverty. They've seen a family living in a garage, or in one room in a house.

"We're encouraging people to come out on delivery day. We never have too many drivers."

The drive needs monetary donations, Wasserman said, because they can buy wholesale, exactly what they need. "The basic boxes are identical, so we know just what we need to get."

There are bins placed around the city for food donations, she said, and nothing goes to waste. "We donate extra food to the kosher food bank, to Jewish Family & Child, or to Ve'ahavta."

She is thankful to the Jewish community for their help in running the drive. "People are really stepping up. Picking up the food in bins at the supermarket is a huge job, and lots of schools and groups come in to help sort and pack the food. Many of the kids have prepared cards, which they put in the box. That makes it much more personal."

High school students looking to get community service hours can make arrangements to come in and help pack, she said.

To participate on delivery day – about 3,000 boxes are packed and delivered – arrive at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St., 8:30 a.m. to noon, with a driver and a helper. For information, call NCJW, 416-633-5100.

Murder of Fogels likened to Purim story

"Let's not forget that when Israel is being attacked," Gissin said. "Let's not forget that western money is used to pay the families of the most outrageous murderers."

The message from the government of Israel is "togetherness and strength," he said.

In a stirring address, Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, likened the murder of the Fogels to the part of the Purim story in which Mordechai tears his clothes and dons sackcloth and ashes when he learns that the Jews of Persia are in danger.

The Fogels "weren't killed because they were settlers. They were killed because they were Jews," Rabbi Strauchler said.

"They lived their lives for the State of Israel and for the Jewish people. These were the best that we have."

The 11-year-old victim, Yoav, had planned to dress as the late Israeli general Moshe Dayan for Purim, the rabbi said.

The murdered baby, Hadas, was "just three months old. Three months old!"

He asked that on Purim, Jews hand out one extra mishloach manot (edible Purim gifts) in memory of the Fogels and in the name of Jewish unity.

"Our hearts are broken almost beyond repair," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Congregation. "They [Palestinians] are giving out cookies in celebration."

Rabbi Bulka said he was angered by the reaction to the killings by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who condemned the murder of "all innocent civilians."

That, Rabbi Bulka said, is "code... their way of saying we don't condemn this at all because we don't consider any Jew as a civilian. Every Jew is a soldier.

"If they are right – that we are all soldiers – that means we are all part of the same army that together is in a battle not only involving Jews but the entire free world. If the Jews lose, the world is finished. The world has to know that."

Rabbi Bulka said seeking revenge is not the Jewish way.

"Vengeance is not in our blood. Vindictiveness is not in our hearts. In the worst of circumstances, we remain sensitive and caring.

"And if an episode like this does not bring us together, then I don't know what will."

Memorial candles were lit by local students and a prayer was recited for the victims of the earthquake, tsunami and nuclear crisis in Japan. The service was led by several young emissaries from Israel.

Psalms and the K'el Maalei Rachamim prayer were recited by Shaarei Shomayim's Cantor Avraham Sultan Politicians in attendance included MPs Joe Volpe and Peter Kent, federal Liberal candidate Karen Mock, and Toronto Ward 10 Councillor James Pasternak.

Co-ordinated response thwarts Iranian intrigue

An unusual set of events occurred last week involving Israel, Egypt and Turkey in the seizure of weapons headed for Gaza. Though very significant developments, they attracted relatively little media attention, given the understandable focus on the emerging nuclear crisis in Japan and upheavals in Libya, Bahrain and Yemen.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On March 16, the National Post carried a Reuters report about Israel's seizure the day before of a German-registered cargo ship, Victoria, in the Mediterranean, 320 kilometres off the Israeli coast. The Victoria had set out from the Syrian port of Latakia, stopped in Turkey, and was headed for Alexandria, Egypt, from where the weapons were to be smuggled to Hamas in Gaza. (According to Israeli officials, Turkey was not involved – the stop at a port there is seen as an Iranian diversionary tactic.)

The ship was taken to the port of Ashdod, where 50 tons of Iranian-supplied weapons were itemized and displayed. These included sophisticated radar-guided "C-704" anti-ship missiles made in Iran. A similar missile disabled an Israeli corvette off the Lebanese coast during the 2006 war against Hezbollah. Israel's navy commander has called them "weapons that shift the balance" in the region.

This is far from the first such interception at sea of Iranian-supplied arms. In 2009, also in the Mediterranean, Israel seized the Francop, which was carrying hundreds of tons of arms, including rockets, for Hezbollah. Not to be forgotten is the "Karine-A" weapons ship, captured in January 2002, carrying tons of Iranian arms for the late Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's Fatah.

Anshell Pfeffer and Barak Ravid reported (Ha'aretz, March 17) that Israel planned to file a complaint with the UN Security Council's sanctions committee over Iran's efforts to smuggle arms to Gaza via the Victoria. The basis is that this represents a gross violation of UN Security Council Resolution 1747, which forbids Iran to export arms. Pfeffer and Ravid reported the committee would also review Iranian arms smuggling efforts worldwide. In the past six months alone, at least five Iranian arms shipments have been seized: in Nigeria, Afghanistan, Italy, the Mediterranean Sea and Southeast Asia.

Yaakov Katz, military analyst for the Jerusalem Post, wrote (March 17) about what he called Israel's ongoing "shadow war" against Iran. The capture of the Victoria "is just another chapter in the larger covert war that Israel is waging against Iran and its terror proxies throughout the Middle East and joins a long list of similar operations that have taken place in recent years.

An Israeli soldier holds one of the missiles found on the Victoria.

"The battle against Iranian arms shipments to Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas is extremely complicated and involves unprecedented co-ordination between Israel and its allies, primarily the United States."

This is where the story gets intriguing.

Just two days before the capture of Victoria, Egypt's military shelled seven vehicles carrying what were likely Iranian-supplied arms from Sudan over the border into Egypt en route to Gaza. Several vehicles were destroyed and the weapons taken.

It has been generally thought that with the overthrow of president Hosni Mubarak in Egypt, Israel would lose its security co-ordination with Cairo and that the Gaza border would become more porous. This incident shows that such concerns have yet to materialize. Egypt still views Iran as a dangerously destabilizing force. And Iran is trying to ramp up its aggression to take advantage of upheaval in the Arab world.

This leads to the third event that occurred during this period. On March 16, Turkey forced an Iranian cargo plane en route from Tehran to Syria to land at a Turkish airfield, where it was reportedly searched for weapons connected to Iran's nuclear program. While Turkey's foreign ministry played down the affair, no disclosure was made about what was found aboard.

As with the case in Egypt, given the frayed relations between Jerusalem and Ankara, this incident is particularly telling. Given its timing, which coincides with the search of the Victoria, it serves as evidence of a still-strong Israeli intelligence link to Turkey. And it shows, too, that Iran is seen as a threat throughout much of the region, and must be confronted as such.

New day school program serves learning disabled

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Children with moderate learning challenges now have the opportunity to be part of the mainstream Hebrew day school system.

Mitch Parker, principal of Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto, a school for children with physical and developmental disabilities, said that a new program housed at the Patricia campus of Eitz Chaim Day Schools caters to students with learning disabilities.

"This is a group of children who need more than the day schools offer, but not as much as Zareinu. It is a niche that needed to be filled," he said.

He acknowledged Eitz Chaim's dean, Rabbi Isser Pliner, as well as staff and students, who welcomed the students into the school.

Currently, the program is running with six students and four staff, and students divide their day between Jewish and general studies.

"They are also integrated into Eitz Chaim daily activities, including morning davening, recess, lunch and gym. That means there is an important social aspect to the program as well."

Until now, Parker said, these students were not getting adequate support in the Hebrew day schools. "Some had one-on-one aides, but the instructional gap increased as they got older."

The six students, he said, were originally at such schools as Zareinu, Associated Hebrew Schools, Cheder Chabad and Netivot HaTorah Day School.

"The program is proving to be a success, and we're hoping to recruit more students. I believe that there s a need for this type of class in the broader community."

A second program, Yeshivas Binyan HaTorah, established with the assistance of Zareinu, is an alternate yeshiva program housed at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue for older students with learning disabilities.

"The seven students in the program want to be in a yeshiva environment, but until now there was not a place for them," Parker said.

The students attend classes six days a week, and faculty is trying to provide individual instruction within a religious context.

"The boys – they would take girls, but none have applied – are learning, and they feel good about themselves. A couple of them had been looking for a yeshiva, but had been told they don't have the skills. This is the answer for them."w

PURIM PARTIERS: Music teacher Marky Weinstock and Rabbi Noam Katz, dean of Jewish living at Leo Baeck Day School and URJ Camp George, lead a sing-along at the third annual community-wide preschool Purim party hosted by Leo Baeck and the camp. More than 500 families attended both north and south events.

National political pundit started professional life at CBC

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Larry Zolf, the offbeat nationally prominent journalist, political pundit and one-time reporter for the CBC current affairs show This Hour Has Seven Days, died March 14 in Toronto at the age of 76.

Zolf began working for the CBC in 1962 and once teamed with a little-known Pierre Trudeau to interview Quebec separatist René Lévesque. Later, when Trudeau was prime minister, he hired Zolf to write two speeches for him for business groups. Both speeches were laden with Zolf's trademark barbs and comic wit.

After Trudeau retired, Zolf wrote Just Watch Me: Remembering Pierre Trudeau, in which he boasted that he was "the only mischief maker that Trudeau approved of or respected."

During the same era, he trashed the institution of the Canadian Senate in a book called Survival of the Fattest: An Irreverent View of the Senate. Several years ago he mentioned the book in a National Post newspaper column in which he jested that Prime Minister Stephen Harper appoint him to the Senate. Another book, Scorpions For Sale (1989) was short-listed for a Stephen Leacock Award.

Zolf won an Anik Award for a documentary film he made about computers in 1965. The National Film Board rated it as one of its 100 best documentaries. He also wrote for Maclean's magazine, was a lecturer at Carleton University and contributed political articles to a CBC blog until 2007.

Acerbic and zany, and blessed with the ability to poke fun at himself

At the height of the Gerda Munsinger scandal of the 1960s, This Hour Has Seven Days dispatched him unannounced to the home of a Quebec cabinet minister who had been implicated in the affair. Despite the presence of a camera crew, the cabinet minister began beating him angrily with his cane, and Zolf responded by kicking him in the leg hard enough that his wooden leg fell away. Zolf later wrote an essay about the farcical episode titled "Citizen Cane."

The CBC once fired him as part of a larger house-cleaning, but later rehired him as a reporter in the Ottawa press gallery.

Larry Zolf

Born in Winnipeg in 1934, Zolf grew up in a secular, Yiddish-speaking home in the city's North End and learned the philosophies of Hegel and Marx on his father's knee. He attended the I. L. Peretz Folk School, where his father was a teacher and principal, and where he read Huckleberry Finn, Moby Dick and other classic works in Yiddish translation. He won an early essay contest with an essay on Emma Lazarus.

Eventually he switched to Machray Public School and dropped his Jewish name, Leibele, in favour of Larry. He attended the University of Manitoba and took graduate courses in law and history at the University of Toronto.

Acerbic and zany, and blessed with the ability to poke fun at himself, Zolf wrote in his autobiographical book The Dialectic Dancer (1973) that on a couple of occasions, he wore large plastic glasses-and-nose to political press conferences, only to remove them to reveal his own genuinely oversized proboscis, declaring himself "the nose that knows."

In one essay he styled himself as the "Jaded Observer," a man "who could see two sides to a question with singular firmness" and who had the capacity "to yield to laughter at the most seriously stentorian times." Although he leavened his strong political opinions with humour, he still became known (as one commentator put it) as "irreverent, opinionated and sometimes outrageous."

Donald Benham, reviewing a new edition of The Dialectic Dancer in the Winnipeg Free Press in January 2011, commented: "What Zolf does tell us is that nothing – not even the War Measures Act – has to be so darned serious."

Despite his strong socialist and pro-labour sympathies, he seemed to migrate to the right along the political spectrum, a shift that might have begun when he started working for federal Progressive Conservative Dalton Camp. He would later describe himself politically as "a Diefenbaker, Bill Davis, Dalton Camp Red Tory."

In The Dialectic Dancer, he wrote of the collapse of his marriage to Patricia, a non-Jewish woman with whom he had two children, David and Rachel. His daughter, Rachel Zolf, is a Toronto poet.

Canada commemorates CJC's historic role

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The role Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has played over nine decades in representing the community and contributing to the country as a whole, has been officially recognized by the federal government.

A commemorative plaque is to be installed permanently at the Monument National, 1182 St. Laurent Blvd., the site of the founding of CJC in March 1919, by the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada.

That gathering of more than 200 delegates representing the estimated 25,000 Jews across the country has been declared "an event of national historical significance."

Environment Minister Peter Kent, who is responsible for Parks Canada, presided over the ceremonial unveiling of the plaque held at Federation CJA's Gelber Centre March 14, almost 92 years to the day since the opening of that founding meeting.

The plaque reads: "This democratic exercise marked the birth of Canadian Jewish Congress, an organization that was at the forefront of the struggle for equality, civil and human rights, and immigration reform in this country.

"Regarded by many as 'the Parliament of Canadian Jewry', the congress continues to provide a voice for the Canadian Jewish community, both nationally and internationally."

At the ceremony, CJC was praised for not only defending the interests of Jews, but also working to ensure the rights of all Canadians throughout its history.

This recognition comes when the future of CJC is in question, as the Canadian Jewish advocacy organizations undergo a major reorganization.

President Mark Freiman, who came in from Toronto, said the event did not signal that CJC is fading into history. On the contrary, he said being so honoured underscores the importance of the organization and the respect with which it is held by this country.

"I don't see this as a eulogy," Freiman said in an interview. "I think we are more focused on the future than the past...I feel no sadness, only pride."

The Honourable Peter Kent, Canada's Environment Minister and Minister responsible for Parks Canada speaks at the commemoration ceremony.

> 'An event of national historical significance'

In his formal remarks, Freiman stated: "Over the past 92 years, CJC has acted with courage and with honour in the defence of the Jewish community, and indeed, of the wider community as well," particularly in pressing for human rights laws and codes.

"We have worked to make a difference in the life of the community and in the individual lives of its members. The work has not always been easy. We have not always won, but we have never given up, nor will we ever."

The Monument National was never the headquarters of CJC. In fact, soon after its establishment CJC became inactive until 1934,when, fearing rising antisemitism, it held its next assembly in Toronto.

In choosing to put the plaque at the Monument National, the cordial relations that existed between Jewish and French Quebecers is being recognized as well. In 1919, the imposing building was a French-Canadian cultural centre, housing the St. Jean-Baptiste Association (later the Jean-Baptiste Society) offices.

Today, the Monument National is owned by the National Theatre School of Canada and is a popular performance space.

The building CJC is most identified with is Samuel Bronfman House on Docteur Penfield Ave., now owned by Concordia University, which was its national headquarters from 1970 until the move to Ottawa in 1998. Its lower level continues to house the CJC national archives.

In addition to the plaque, the historic sites board has published a pamphlet providing a brief history of CJC, illustrated with archival photos.

"CJC has been the Jewish community's voice nationally and internationally, and has worked for justice, equality and human dignity for all," Kent said.

Kent, who represents Toronto's Thornhill riding, noted that Canadian Jews' contribution is often multigenerational and multi-faceted, citing the fact that CJC founding president Lyon Cohen's grandson is singer/songwriter Leonard Cohen.

Also participating in the proceedings were Mount Royal Liberal member of Parliament Irwin Cotler, who was CJC president from 1980 to 1983. He observed that the newly founded CJC supported the creation of a homeland for the Jewish people in Palestine.

Conservative Senator Larry Smith, Montreal executive committee member Helen Fotopulos, and Quebec Jewish Congress president Adam Atlas also spoke. Another past national president Goldie Hershon (1995 to 1998) was present.

Among the approximately 100 guests at the ceremony were representatives of a number of ethnic and religious communities.

CJC chief executive officer Bernie Farber said this is the first time the historic sites board has extended this recognition to an advocacy organization.

Remarks by the politicians show that CJC "is seen by all as the voice of Canadian Jewry representing its interests on a myriad of issues...[Words] of praise from the minister recognized not only CJC's contribution over 92 years but affirmed the fact that CJC is known across the country as the premier advocate and NGO on matters of human rights, human dignity and social justice. It made us all proud."

CJC was also recognized in the House of Commons by all parties. On March 10, four members rose to laud CJC's historic contributions: Conservative, Scott Reid; Liberal, Cotler; New Democrat, Thomas Mulcair; and Claude Bachand of the Bloc Québécois.

PQ members funding 'antisemitic' website

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) thinks Parti Québécois (PQ) officials should not be contributing financially to a website that posts content the CIC deems to be antisemitic.

Vigile.net, which has been in existence for 15 years, provides news and commentary on mainly Quebec politics and serves as a forum for exchange between sovereigntists. Maintained by Bernard Frappier and supported by private donors, it has no official link with the PQ.

Richard Marceau, the CIC's senior adviser on government relations and a former Bloc Québécois member of Parliament, said he has observed an increasingly hateful tone in what Vigile.net carries about certain minorities, especially Jews, over the past five or six years, that cannot be dismissed as isolated.

He also believes it has crossed the line of acceptability in the content and tone of its criticism of Israel, to which he also feels it pays disproportionate attention.

"I would call it really disgusting," he said, "clearly antisemitic, and that is not a word I use lightly."

During Vigile.net's current fundraising campaign, the names of recent contributors and the amounts they gave and when are posted on the site.

PQ members of the National Assembly Bernard Drainville, Bertrand St. Arnaud, Louise Beaudoin and Agnès Maltais are among those listed as contributing in the past six months.

Others include Jean-François Lisée, columnist and former adviser to Lucien Bouchard, and former cabinet minister Richard Le Hir, who is cited as one of the biggest donors of the year at $750, as well as some PQ riding associations.

Since Marceau went public with his criticism March 17 in the newspaper La Presse, Drainville, a former Radio-Canada journalist until he entered politics in 2007, has distanced himself from the site.

He communicated that the PQ "dissociates itself from antisemitic remarks found in the certain texts posted on Vigile.net" and that the party has "fought against discrimination against any community."

Maltais followed suit with a similar statement.

But Vigile.net has responded by running a defiant editorial, under Frappier's name, headed "From intimidation to defamation," stating that "we are in Quebec where we can still exchange opinions even on the backs of oligarchies." The statement is accompanied by a photo of Parliament's Peace Tower, with a Canadian flag behind it in which the maple leaf has been replaced by a Star of David.

The site's preoccupations are clear from its front page. There are sections under the headings "Propagande sioniste" and "antisémitisme intimidation," for example.

Vigile.net has published content accusing Jews of duplicity, of controlling political and financial institutions, and of war-mongering, as well as conflating the Quebec nationalist cause with Israel's alleged repression of the Palestinians. Quebec is referred to as a "Zionist colony," and Montreal Jews are accused of treating French Quebecers as Palestinians.

Kosher for Pesach?

"What makes a bird kosher?" Rabbi Heber asks the kids.

"Because it has wings?" one student calls.

"No, feathers!" another interrupts.

Along with PowerPoint presentations and Rabbi Heber's upbeat outreach, COR has also updated its website and added that essential of the modern age, a twitter feed, so that consumers can keep up with kosher alerts, the adventures of COR rabbis, and under-140-character gems such as, "Half the food on supermarket shelves is now reported to be kosher! I'm on fire today."

Hands go up when Rabbi Heber asks, "How many kosher symbols are there in the world?" "Forty!" "Fifty thousand!" He agrees that there are over 1,000, and passes out copies of the COR's new wallet-sized card with many of the most common symbols.

Two important services, as Passover approaches, are community koshering events – one to be held in the BAYT in Thornhill and another at a location further south – and a Passover hotline. To reach COR with, a Passover kashrut question, call 416-635-9550, ext. 274 (or just wait to hear the prompts), e-mail questions@cor.ca or, on the website, click the "ask the rabbi" forum.

Will someone get back to consumers, even at the last minute? On erev Pesach, a rotation of rabbis are given one-hour timeslots to check messages and return calls and e-mails.

As for the rest of the year, Rabbi Felder "would like those people who only keep kosher for Pesach to become more educated, more knowledgeable, and try to keep kosher for more than just Pesach."

In a community where, according to Rabbi Heber, "many kids don't know the name of a kosher restaurant," his classroom visit is often their first introduction to kashrut as part of Jewish life. COR hopes some of his paraphernalia makes it home so that the parents, too, can start talking about keeping kosher – at Passover and beyond.

Industry minister is halachically Jewish

Grandmother born in Syria to family of traders

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The current federal government boasts no Jewish members of Parliament. At least that's what most people think.

But speaking to The CJN last week, Industry Minister Tony Clement revealed that halachically speaking, he is a Jew.

Clement's Jewishness is matrilineal. His grandmother was born in Aleppo, Syria, to a family of Jewish mercantile traders who spoke Arabic. The family name was Djebbah.

In the early 20th century, Clement's grandparents settled in Manchester, England – then renowned for its textile industry, he said – and conceived his mother, who eventually married a Greek Cypriot.

Clement was also born in Manchester.

His parents ended up divorced, but Clement said his early years were not informed by any religious upbringing.

"My parents had a truce" on promoting religion in the home, he said.

Informed that in the eyes of Jewish law, he would be considered Jewish, Clement said "I would, yes."

"But according to Greek Cypriot law, I'm Greek Orthodox, so there you go," he said, adding that he is a practising Christian, though not in the Greek Orthodox stream.

"But [Judaism] is a part of my heritage, part of my past and one that I'm very proud of."

He said his November 2009 working visit to Israel – his first – helped him realize that he needed to know more about his Jewish roots.

"It was such a thrill to finally get to Israel in 2009 for [personal] reasons as well as for the official reasons. But that visit helped me face my heritage, certainly," he said.

Ever since, he said he's been on more of a personal quest to "reconnect" with the Jewish side of his family.

"My [Jewish heritage] is something I'd like to explore more. I know some of my Jewish relatives, but they're spread all over the world now. One of these days now, I'd like to have more contact with them."

In addition to talking about his roots, Clement also said Israel continues to figure prominently on his list of professional objectives.

Over the last two years, under his watch, Clement has helped nurture increasing Canada-Israel business ties. He said it's something he plans to continue.

"We're upping our collaboration on the Canada-Israel front. That's been one of my initiatives as industry minister since my visit to Israel in 2009," he said.

That visit, he said, culminated in a dialogue, with Israel's chief scientist, Eli Opper.

"We had an initial Canada-Israel collaboration meeting in Toronto several months ago and intend to have another one in Israel later on this year," he said, although no date has been set.

Scientists and venture capitalists from both countries attended what was called an "innovation summit" in Toronto last October.

Clement said that so far, Canada and Israel are concentrating on three development fronts: water technology, neuroscience and "clean energy" research and development.

Tony Clement delivers remarks in Toronto last week

"We've started to really put down some roots in the commercialization area of some of these R&D projects, and my philosophy is that right now, we have the best diplomatic relations we've ever had with Israel.

"We have very close military and security interests, and yet in commercialization and collaboration on industrial development, we should be a lot closer and get more projects done. That's what I've been working on for the last year or so. We are starting to see these come to fruition, and I am going to keep pushing so that these collaborations continue."

Clement was in Toronto last week to discuss the government's Knowledge Infrastructure Program, which has invested billions in an effort to enhance the infrastructure of Canadian post-secondary institutions to create job opportunities for graduates in response to the recession.

B.C. Jewish museum moves to new location

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Museum & Archives of B.C. has a new home as of March 1, in Vancouver's Peretz Centre for Secular Jewish Culture, where it now occupies the Berson Lounge on the second floor.

The move from the third floor of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, where the museum previously occupied a sizable exhibition space since 2007, was mainly for financial reasons, said its education co-ordinator, Molly Winston.

"We had to scale down to a small office space, because we found that we've been more successful reaching audiences through public programming and touring exhibitions than by having a poorly attended exhibition space of our own," she said.

"We're focusing our efforts more on traveling exhibitions around the province and around Canada, an improved website with digitized oral history interviews and online exhibits that are accessible to everyone."

With an annual operating budget of $300,000, the museum relies on funding from annual memberships and grants for education and archival work from the federal and provincial governments, as well as Heritage Canada, archival associations in British Columbia and Canada, the City of Vancouver and smaller foundations.

Recent exhibitions include the Jewish history of New Westminster, B.C., in honour of the city's 150th anniversary. That exhibition will soon be travelling to the New Westminster Museum and Archives. A small display on the history of the Jews of Richmond, B.C., will open in the Richmond Public Library in April 2011.

The museum conducts ongoing oral history interviews with select members of the community, as well as walking history tours of Jewish Vancouver in the summer months.

The new office is located at 6184 Ash St. in Vancouver. For more information, visit www.jewishmuseum.com or call 604-257-5199.

Police investigate Twitter threats

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Montreal police are investigating 21-year-old McGill student Haaris Khan after he allegedly threatened his peers with violent anti-Zionist and antisemitic posts on Twitter.

Khan posted the alarming tweets from his BlackBerry on March 8 while attending a film screening of Indoctrinate U on campus. The event was hosted by the McGill University Conservative Association and Libertarian McGill.

"I'm watching a Zionist/Conservative propaganda film at a secret Zionist convention," Khan wrote on his then-public Twitter page. Minutes later, he posted that he "should have brought an M16."

The film was a documentary about political correctness and liberal biases on university campuses.

Over the course of the evening, Khan posted several other tweets on the popular social networking site, including, "My blood is boiling. I want to shoot everyone in this room."

Approximately 40 students attended the screening, held in McGill's Leacock building.

Khan later posted that he would "destroy the Jew-WASP consortium" and that "the jihad begins today."

Another post said he had no attachment to McGill's Muslim Students' Association or other Arab groups, insisting that he "had no base camp behind him."

He continued with posts that read, "Zionism was born of the venomous seed of Satan" and said that he objected to the "sluggish tactics and concentration of power by the Toronto-Jewish circle at McGill."

According to the campus newspaper the McGill Tribune, Montreal Police were contacted by campus security on March 10 after a member of Conservative McGill found and reported Khan's tweets.

Event participants were said to have been unaware of the posts at the time of the incident, as Khan was sitting quietly at the back of the room while posting the messages from his BlackBerry.

After news spread about Khan's tweets, McGill students formed a Facebook page titled "McGill: Stop Hate, Protect Students."

I should have brought an M16.

I'm watching a Zionist/Conservative propaganda film at a secret Zionist convention, in case anyone's confused.

This experience has hardened me into a soldier for freedom and truth. These savages will not rule me. They will not win.

I'm scared for my life.

This is crazy. This is Satanic. This is evil.

My blood is boiling. I want to shoot everyone in this room. I'm frightened, alarmed, and downright pissed. Never been this angry.

Hmm, seeing my arch-nemesis in this setting boils my blood. He's actually so slimy its criminal. He's not a warrior but a slug.

Plummer, Shyam Patel, and Joel Pedneault are elected and open avenues.

I am a patron of freedom, a champion of truth, and a staunch advocate of diversity and the involvement of local Montrealers at McGill.

Furthermore, I feel no attachment to the Muslim Student Association or any Arab groups. Nor am I socialist. I have no base camp behind me.

I object to the sluggish tactics and concentration of power by the Toronto-Jewish circle at McGill, but peacemaking has always been my M.O.

I'd only be intensifying the already virulent discourse and allowing myself to be defeated by the forces of polarization. What to do...

I have to take a step back and assess myself. Do I want to continue driving a wedge between Jews and Muslims at JNF DODGEBALLERS: University of Western Ontario students, from left, Harrison Notkin, Evan Silver and Zack Silverberg, organizers of the Viridis JNF Charity Dodgeball Tournament, helped raise $4,500 for the rehabilitation effort in the Carmel forest region in northern Israel. When Notkin – a member of the student group Viridis, which raises awareness about environmental issues – learned about the forest fire that ravaged the Carmel in December, his group partnered with the Jewish National Fund in London, Ont., to raise money for the cause. The event, which attracted some 50 participants, was held March 13 at London Central Secondary School.

'Vicious hate speech unacceptable anywhere'

The page creators demanded that McGill's administration "take these charges seriously and take action to assure that McGill University maintains a safe and secure campus."

McGill's deputy provost, Morton Mendelson, issued a statement March 17 saying that while the incident has been taken "very seriously" by the administration, "if the tweeted messages were deemed to pose a real threat, we would have taken very different action.

"We must avoid causing needless panic or delivering 'false alarms' that could lead to complacency in the event of real threats in the future," Mendelson wrote.

Hillel Montreal and the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students released a statement last week applauding the decision of McGill and the police to investigate the matter, and stressed that "this is no indication that this situation is representative of the climate at McGill University or at any of Montreal's academic institutions."

Some students, however, are less than satisfied with how the incident is being handled.

Alexandre Meterissian, who first informed the Montreal police of the tweets, said he's very disappointed by the reaction of the McGill administration.

"They did not inform us of the process being followed and what they planned on doing. It took many media interviews with newspapers and TV channels to actually get a formal public reaction from them," he said.

Meterissian, who was present at the film screening, said he hopes the university will put student safety at the top of its priorities in the future.

In contrast, he described the Montreal police as "very helpful," adding that they took the incident "much more seriously than the administration."

Kevin Pidgeon, a member of Conservative McGill who helped organize the event, also described the McGill administration as "slow and unhelpful."

He stressed that McGill administrators didn't address what he calls "virulent, and frankly, disturbing antisemitism," and said he's concerned that "they did not feel the tweets warranted telling the community.

"If frank and disturbing hate speech is not warranting of an expulsion, I don't know what is," Pidgeon said.

While he supports the right to free speech, Pidgeon urged that "vicious hate speech and antisemitic remarks are unacceptable anywhere."

In an interview with the McGill Tribune on March 14, Khan reportedly apologized for the posts, saying he's not religious and doesn't own any weapons. He said he uses Twitter as an outlet and that his posts were taken out of context.

Khan added that he did not consider himself antisemitic and "had no problem with Jews."

IBD affects more than 20,000 Canadians

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Marilyn Finkelstein and her late husband, Albert, were desperate for information about Crohn's disease when their son David was diagnosed 36 years ago.

"After many trips to the doctors and numerous hospital visits," Finkelstein said, "no one, including my family doctor, could figure out what was wrong."

She found herself at the University of Toronto medical school library, where there was only one book with only one paragraph on Crohn's disease. The Finkelsteins then spearheaded an initiative that subsequently resulted in the formation of what is now known as the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada (CCFC), a volunteer–based not-for-profit medical research foundation.

"That day in 1974, my life was changed forever," she said. Her focus then, as it is today, was "to help find a cure."

Her second son, Gary, was diagnosed with Crohn's disease 10 years later.

Inflammatory bowel disease (IBD) includes Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis, two similar yet distinct conditions that cause intestinal tissue to become inflamed, form sores and bleed easily.

Symptoms include abdominal pain, cramps, fatigue and diarrhea. The CCFC is launching a Can't Wait iPhone, Android and web application that will help people find the public washroom closest to them. A web-based version of Can't Wait is online at www.cantwait.ca.

Statistics from CCFC indicate that more than 200,000 Canadians, an estimated one in 160, live with IBD. Most people are diagnosed before the age of 30.

The foundation notes that there is no cure and there is little understanding of the pain, chronic suffering and isolation IBD patients cope with every day of their lives.

Finkelstein, who speaks from coast to coast on behalf of the foundation, said that to help reduce the feeling of isolation felt by people living with IBD, there's a need to raise public awareness of this chronic disease.

"People living with IBD too often face their condition in silence," she said. "There are some who are afraid to venture away from home, cutting off the possibility of many great experiences."

With Crohn's disease, inflammation can occur anywhere in the gastrointestinal tract but is usually present in the lower part of the small intestine and the colon.

Ulcerative colitis only affects portions of the large intestine. It typically inflames only the innermost lining of the bowel tissue.

Both are lifelong diseases that can flare up at unpredictable times. No one is sure what causes a person to go into remission or what launches an acute episode.

There are medications that can improve symptoms, decrease inflammation and lead to a better quality of life. Public awareness and more sophisticated diagnostic equipment also make the conditions easier to deal with for some.

"The Foundation will continue to pursue its goal of finding a cure for IBD," Finkelstein said. "We know the cure is more than a dream – one day it will be a reality.

"Medical research is simply the best hope for finding a cure. My dream is to be present at the closing of this foundation. They are getting closer to unraveling the cause."

Exercise can help reduce fibromyalgia pain

FITNESS CORNER
BY FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

A recent Swedish study found that women with fibromyalgia who used walking poles improved their fitness levels without an increase in symptoms. Walking poles activate upper body and core muscles for balance.

The results of this study are important because in the past studies involving moderate to high-intensity exercise had shown that it triggers fibromyalgia symptoms.

Fibromyalgia is said to affect more than a million people in Canada, mostly women between the ages of 35 and 55. It is a syndrome that results in chronic widespread pain, stiffness, tenderness in joints and muscles, fatigue, anxiety, restless sleep and depression. While there is no known cure for fibromyalgia, there is much you can do to help manage the disease and your pain.

Treatments for fibromyalgia are as unique as the person who has it. It is usually treated with a combination of prescription medications, natural therapies such as acupuncture or massage, patient education, aerobic activity, relaxation exercises, stress reduction and proper nutrition.

Studies have proven that low-impact aerobic exercise helps reduce pain and stiffness, as well as creates a sense of well-being, increasing the quality of life for people with fibromyalgia. A graded aerobic exercise program performed twice a week that starts gently and progresses gradually to endurance and strength training is important in preventing setbacks.

Keeping muscles conditioned and healthy by exercising three times a week is known to decrease the amount of discomfort of fibromyalgia. Rest periods in between exercise are important in reducing symptoms.

Regular exercises can boost energy levels and help with sleep. Low-impact aerobics, walking, water aerobics, stationary bicycle, yoga and tai chi are perfect choices for someone with fibromyalgia. Check with your doctor to find out if these exercises are for you.

The use of heat as well as other treatments such as hot baths, showers, acupuncture, massage, mud baths and saunas are also helpful in managing fibromyalgia pain.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Number of rocket attacks from Gaza escalating

Yanir Yagna
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Grad rocket fired from Gaza exploded in an open area in the industrial district of southern Ashkelon on Sunday evening.

A number of people were treated for shock following the explosion, which caused no damage.

Israel has seen an upsurge in the number of rockets being fired from Gaza of late, the peak being on Saturday when the southern part of the country was hit by over 50 rockets.

On Saturday, Israel Defence Forces killed two Palestinian terrorists near the Gaza border.

An IDF spokesperson said the troops fired after identifying two terrorists near the border.

Two Israelis were wounded and a home was damaged by the barrage of rockets fired at Israel on Saturday morning.

Hamas, which rules the Gaza Strip, claimed responsibility for 10 of Saturday's rockets, an unusual move after a long period in which it had let other, smaller, militant groups do its bidding.

"Targeting the enemy's posts was a response to the ongoing Zionist assaults, airstrikes and tanks shelling the Gaza Strip. The latest was two days ago, where two of our mujahideen were killed," said Hamas' armed wing, the Al-Qassam Brigades.

Responding to the rockets later on Saturday, Israel struck several Hamas targets in Gaza.

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman instructed Israel's UN envoy to lodge a formal complaint as a result of the rocket barrage.

In a message to the United Nations, Lieberman warned that a future Palestinian state would be a "terrorist state whose first and foremost goal is the destruction of Israel."

The offensive from Gaza took place while "Hamas and the Palestinian Authority were talking about reunification," Lieberman's message said.

In the past week, there have been rallies in Hamas-ruled Gaza and the Fatah-ruled West Bank calling for Palestinian reunification. Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas announced last week that he intends to go to Gaza to end the more than three years of internal division between his Fatah party and Hamas.

Lieberman wrote that the talk of reunification during the barrage of rockets shows that "the international support the Palestinians are trying to garner would be support for the creation of a terrorist state."

The Palestinians have been pressing leaders worldwide to recognize an independent Palestinian state, an issue they plan on bringing to a vote at September's UN General Assembly.

Other Israeli officials also responded harshly to Saturday's bombardment, with Kadima head Tzipi Livni saying that "the right way to contend with Hamas is with force."

The owner of a home in Kibbutz Kissufim, in southern Israel, stands in her living room that was damaged by a mortar shell fired by Palestinian terrorists from the Gaza Strip last weekend. [Flash90 photo]

Israel seizes arms boat

JERUSALEM — Iran denied Israeli assertions that it sent weapons to Gaza aboard a ship intercepted by Israel's navy.

"The Jerusalem occupation regime is a regime of lies, production of lies and dissemination of lies. We reject all of these mendacious reports," the Iranian army's chief of staff, Gen. Atallah Salhi, told the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency on March 16.

"God willing, this regime will sink into the Mediterranean Sea like the regime of the pharaohs in Egypt," he said.

The Liberia-flagged cargo ship Victoria was seized on March 15 in the Mediterranean Sea, 200 miles west of Israel. The German-owned ship, which originated in Syria, was headed to Egypt via Turkey with tons of concealed weapons that Israel said were bound for Gaza.

The sophisticated missiles found aboard the Victoria came with manuals in Farsi.

Meanwhile, Egyptian officials told the Associated Press that its military seized five trucks that entered the country carrying weapons from Sudan bound for Gaza. The weapons were to be ferried through smuggling tunnels between Egypt and Gaza, AP reported.

"The various weaponry on board the vessel was intended for the use of terror organizations operating in the Gaza Strip," the Israel Defence Forces said in a statement.

There were "tons" of concealed weapons, Ha'aretz reported, citing the IDF. The crew did not appear to be aware of the weapons stash, according to reports.

The German-owned ship left from Turkey's Mersin port and was headed for Egypt's Alexandria port. Turkey is not tied to the incident, the IDF said.

The navy brought the ship into Israel's port at Ashdod for further inspection, and there was no resistance from the crew, according to the IDF.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, commenting on the ship's seizure during a visit to Israel's south, said he approved of the navy's interception of the Victoria.

"We had a solid basis that on board the ship was weaponry destined for use against Israel," he said. "Considerable weaponry, which was destined for terrorist forces in the heart of Gaza, was found on board the vessel.

"The operation was carried out at sea in accordance with all international rules. The weaponry originated in Iran, which is trying to arm the Gaza Strip."

Israel has seized ships carrying weapons to Gaza in the past. In 2003, the Israeli military seized the Karine A, which was carrying 50 tons of missiles, mortars, rifles and ammunition to the Gaza Strip.

Syria kills protesters

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Syrian army deployed on Monday at the entrances to the southern city of Daraa as officials tried to calm passions following protests for freedom in which five civilians were killed, residents said.

Thousands of mourners marched at the funeral of 23-year-old Raed al-Kerad who died on Sunday, the latest of five protesters to be killed by security forces. Mourners chanted slogans demanding political freedom and an end to corruption.

"God, Syria, freedom. The people want the overthrow of corruption," they chanted.

The slogan is a play on the phrase, "The people want the overthrow of the regime," the rallying cry of the revolutions that overthrew the entrenched leaders of Tunisia and Egypt and spread across the Arab world.

The mourners later gathered at the al-Omari mosque in the old quarter of Daraa near the border with Jordan.

Troops set up checkpoints at the entrances of Daraa and were checking identity cards. The Syrian justice minister arrived at a city hall.

The five demonstrators killed last Friday took part in a peaceful protest demanding political freedom and an end to corruption in Syria, witnesses said.

Syrian state media said security forces dispersed protesters in two towns in the most serious unrest in years in one of the Mideast's most repressive states.

Several thousand protesters chanted "God, Syria, freedom" and other anti-corruption slogans, accusing the family of the president of corruption, when they were shot dead by security forces who were reinforced with troops flown in by helicopters, a resident said.

Amateur video footage posted Friday on YouTube and Twitter shows large groups of protesters in several cities throughout Syria but its authenticity could not be immediately be independently confirmed.

State television said some infiltrators in the town of Daraa caused chaos and riots, and smashed cars and property before they were chased off by riot police. It said a similar demonstration in the coastal town of Baniyas was dispersed without incident.

One amateur video showed what appeared to show Syrian government trucks spraying water on marchers. Two others purport to show several thousand men gathering in the cities of Homs and Baniyas.

Marseille befriends Jerusalem

The city of Marseille, France, has given a bronze fountain to the city of Jerusalem as a show of friendship. Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat thanked Marseille Mayor Jean Claude Gaudin for his gift of the "Fontaine Longchamp," which stands more than 11 feet high. The fountain, which is on its way to Israel, is an exact replica of the famous fountain on Marseille's Boulevard Longchamp. Barkat met with Gaudin in Jerusalem's city council chamber. A delegation of business and community leaders from Marseille accompanied Gaudin on his visit to Israel. "Our gift, which represents comradeship, peace and coexistence, is a symbol of our close ties with the city of Jerusalem, which we are interested in deepening even further," Gaudin said in the chamber.

Egypt resumes gas supply

Egypt resumed supplying Israel with natural gas after a six-week interruption. The gas flow resumed late on the night of March 14. The disruption in supply came after a gas line was sabotaged on Feb. 5 during the uprising in Egypt that ousted president Hosni Mubarak. Egypt supplies more than 40 per cent of the gas Israel needs to provide the country with electricity. It's not clear if Israel will now receive gas in the same quantities as before. Some Israeli media have accused the Egyptian interim military government authorities of delaying the supply of gas to Israel for political reasons. Egypt has suggested it won't supply the usual amounts of gas as before, and reportedly wants to renegotiate better terms for its gas supply contract with Israel.

Landmines to be cleared

The Knesset unanimously passed legislation that authorizes the removal of landmine fields throughout the country. The bill, which passed second and third readings by a vote of 43-0, creates the National Authority for Land Mine Clearance. The efforts of Daniel Yuval, 12, who lost his leg after stepping on a land mine last year during a hike in the Golan Heights, helped to advance the measure. The Israeli government will commit about $7.5 million to the clearing effort. The rest is expected to come from humanitarian organizations. The Israeli military began removing mines along the border with Jordan last month, according to Ha'aretz, which reported that as many as 400,000 mines are buried there. Hundreds of minefields also are buried in the Golan Heights, in case of war with Syria.

Building plan concerns U.S.

The Obama administration expressed "deep concern" about new settlement building plans announced by Israel after a deadly terrorist attack. "The United States is deeply concerned by continuing Israeli actions with respect to settlements in the West Bank," State Department spokeswoman Tanya Powell said in a statement. "Continued Israeli settlements are illegitimate and run counter to efforts to resume direct negotiations." Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced the building of 500 new units in several West Bank towns that most believe will be part of Israel in a peace deal, in the wake of the March 11 attack in which five members of the Fogel family, three children and their parents, were stabbed to death in Itamar as they slept.

Some Diaspora clergy selling conversions: chief rabbi

Yair Ettinger
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's Sephardi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Amar last week accused some Orthodox rabbis outside Israel of authorizing conversions to Judaism in exchange for bribes.

"We have received reports of several rabbis who convert for money," Rabbi Amar said at a special meeting of the Committee for Immigration, Absorption and Diaspora Affairs at his offices in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Amar claims that the phenomenon takes place in North America, South America and Europe, and he referred to the example of a convert who testified to him that he was converted by an Orthodox rabbi for the sum of $1 million.

"Certainly this is an exceptional case," Rabbi Amar said. "But there are also examples of conversions for less than a million dollars," although he would give no other specific examples.

Rabbi Amar's remarks were made in support of the policy of the Chief Rabbinate and the Interior Ministry for the last two years of not recognizing the conversions of most Orthodox rabbis outside of Israel.

The implication of the decision of the Chief Rabbinate is that only some people who converted to Judaism outside of Israel are eligible to immigrate to Israel under the Law of Return, which grants automatic Israeli citizenship to Jews.

The committee was convened after an article published in Ha'aretz in February exposed the increasing reach of the Israeli Rabbinate's jurisdiction over Jews in the Diaspora.

According to a High Court decision, the civil registry must grant Reform and Conservative converts to Judaism the status of new Jewish immigrants, but paradoxically, the court determined that the Israeli rabbinate would retain jurisdiction over conversions conducted by Orthodox rabbis in the Diaspora.

At the committee meeting, it was suggested that the rabbinate's policies were actually pushing prospective immigrants to opt for conversions through the Conservative or Reform streams instead of the Orthodox one.

Rabbi Shlomo Amar

Rabbi Joel Tessler, who heads a large Orthodox community in Potomac, Md., also addressed the meeting. He's one of the rabbis whose conversions the rabbinate refuses to recognize, and he said there is no justification for this.

Attorney Daniel Solomon of the Interior Ministry outraged members of the committee when he was unable to produce a list of overseas rabbis whose conversions are either recognized or not. But he insisted there's nothing new in the ministry's policy of consulting the rabbinate on this issue.

Rabbi Amar revealed that a team of jurists and representatives of various government offices are currently trying to draft a policy on Orthodox conversions overseas that would withstand a legal challenge. But he stressed that the decision to recognize American and Canadian conversions by selected rabbinical courts only had the full consent of the Rabbinical Council of America, a leading North American organization of Orthodox rabbis.

Many Orthodox rabbis, especially from the modern Orthodox movement, do not belong to the RCA, and they say this decision was aimed primarily at reducing their power. But Rabbi Amar insisted that the decision's sole purpose was to create an "orderly" conversion process run by "worthy" rabbis.

The committee chairman, Likud MK Danny Danon, accepted this claim, saying, "we all want to see more and more Jews immigrating to Israel, but we aren't willing to accept conversion over the Internet or by mail."

Ha'aretz publicized the story of Thomas Dohlan, a Canadian soldier who converted to Judaism but was not recognized as a Jew under the Law of Return. The Interior Ministry said it doesn't recognize the conversions performed by the Orthodox rabbi who converted him.

Dohlan later received an immigrant's certificate and an Israeli identity number when he arrived here with his Israeli wife and four children last month. But he still hasn't received his identity card, and last week the Interior Ministry again refused to issue it to him.

Rabbi Seth Farber of ITIM, the Jewish Life Information Center, who has been helping the family, said in response to Rabbi Amar's statement that "the decision not to recognize all Orthodox conversions in the Diaspora because of a few cases of local corruption is utterly out of proportion."

"Clear criteria must be set under the Law of Return as to what constitutes a recognized community, and then we should rely on the local professionals," Rabbi Farber said. "The Interior Ministry doesn't have enough information to determine what is or isn't a recognized community."

Guests of Niagara Falls, N.Y., spa get pampered

Spa Life

By KATHRYN KATES

Just over the Rainbow... Bridge, that is, is The Spa & Salon at Seneca Niagara, at the very grand, Seneca Niagara Casino & Hotel in Niagara Falls, N.Y., a Four Diamond Award winner.

Spa manager Hattie Dolan-Gawron says its mission is to provide guests with the opportunity for esthetic self-indulgence and relaxation in a warm friendly environment.

The spa's décor reflects elements of the earth by utilizing natural stones on the walls, rich woods throughout and a waterfall feature. It has seven massage rooms, three esthetic rooms, two wet treatment rooms, six styling stations, four manicure and four pedicure stations, a couples' suite with a private hydrotherapy tub, saunas and men's and women's private locker rooms. All registered hotel guest have access to the adjoining pool and fitness areas.

On staff are three estheticians, seven massage therapists, four hairstylists and two nail technicians. The Spa & Salon offers a complete range of services – facials, body treatments, massages, waxing, manicures, pedicures, makeup applications and hairstyling. The product lines used are Pevonia Skin Care, Lanza Hair Care & Colour Line, Kenra Hair Care, OPI Nail Care and Bio Freeze. In addition, there are two retail areas.

"Our clientele consists of equal local and transient guests, with 70 per cent being women," says Dolan-Gawron. "We have a beautiful Signature Facial Caviar & Pearls, which is anti-aging, and a new treatment called Tranquility Signature Massage that incorporates massage, hot towels, wasabi stones and a sinus pressure release."

The spa offers many packages, including the most popular Queen for the Day, which comes with a facial, a 50-minute massage and a choice of a body treatment. Other packages include the King for the Day, Full House and Two of a Kind... in keeping with the hotel's gaming theme.

The private couples' jacuzzi.

Refreshments such as chocolate-dipped strawberries and champagne are available to guests spending three hours or more being pampered.

Just launched are a number of spa packages that include accommodations at the Seneca Niagara Casino & Hotel, along with food vouchers for one of the many restaurants. They offer everything from casual fare to fine dining at the Western Door Steakhouse. Kosher meals can be ordered for guests from outside the hotel with advance notice.

The hotel boasts of 594 modern rooms and suites with upscale amenities, including large flat-screen TVs and comfy pillow-top beds. Many of the rooms have great views of the Niagara area on both sides of the border.

For those wanting to be entertained, check out the Bear's Den Showroom, which plays host to a number of well-known showbiz acts from comedian Bill Cosby and singer Rob Thomas to country crooner Trace Atkins. Or, you can meet and mingle and belly up to the bar, with your fellow high-rollers at Club 101, in the heart of the gaming floor. The gaming floor also has more than 4,000 slot machines.

If you can pull yourself away from the hotel's spa and the casino, there is lots to see and do in Niagara USA. The area has performing arts centres and museums, including the Herschell Carrousel Factory Museum and Tiffany Windows in Lockport.

In the warmer months, adventures begin on the lower Niagara rapids on the Whirlpool Jet Boat Tour. Niagara Falls State Park boasts 400 acres of protected wildlife and lush landscape, and hikers can have hours of fun discovering the Niagara Gorge, while fishermen and women can tackle the Niagara River.

Of course, no trip to Niagara USA is complete without a stop at fashion outlets. Be sure to ask the hotel's front desk staff for discount coupons before you go on your designers ware shopping spree.

For more information about Seneca Niagara Casino & Hotel, call 1-877-873-6322 or online at www.TheSenecaCasinos.com. For an appointment at the spa, call 1-888-849-4477 or 716-278-3696.

Spring, our favourite time of the year! After a long and cold winter, the trees are anxious to show their true colours and the flowers are beginning to bloom. Spring is a time to enjoy all the new beautiful colours, as it is also the time to enjoy new fashion styles and new beauty trends.

Our skin has taken a beating, and it is now time to rejuvenate those cells that have been damaged by the cold temperatures. Begin your skin regimen with a facial scrub either at home or with a professional esthetician. Make sure to use a moisturizer, as this will prepare the skin for the coming new weather.

Foundation should be lighter in texture at this time of year. You want to feel fresh and comfortable. Make sure your moisturizer and foundation have an SPF coverage of 15 or more.

This season it is all about colour. Eye shadows come in beautiful pastel shades such as greens, purples, greys, pinks and shades of blue. Eye liner tops it off with all shades of violet. Lips are bright in shades of orange to peach and vibrant shades of pink. Cheeks are bright and colourful. Everything is suitable for all ages. Most important, make sure to choose shades for day and for evening.

No matter how much makeup you choose to put on, your look should be fresh. Bring out your best features and don't forget to drink lots of water, take that 1/2-hour walk, and enjoy all these wonderful tips we are about to share with you.

Göt2b introduces its new line of styling products that fit your lifestyle and budget. With weekly blow-drys becoming more popular and colour appointments more expensive, women are looking for products that will maintain their style and not wash their investment down the sink. Skipping a day of shampooing pays off, as göt2b is excited to introduce its new Rockin' it line featuring a long-lasting Rockin' It Dry Shampoo, Rockin' It Hairspray, and Rockin' It Gel.

Göt2b introduces POWDER'ful – a powerful source of volume in just 10 seconds. Full tousled tresses are at the top of everyone's hair-wish list, but how do you save your 'do' from the dreaded 3 p.m. droop? We tend to think the only cure for limp, lifeless hair is another wash and blow-dry. For fresh texture and va va voom volume à la model Giselle Bündchen, look no further than göt2b's new POWDER'ful styling powder.

Beautiful, natural curls get everyone's attention. From the tight corkscrewed curls of Sarah Jessica Parker to the soft, winding curls of Alicia Keys, there can be little doubt that beautiful natural curls are one of the hottest looks today. The beauty and popularity of this style speaks for itself. But even natural, bouncy curls and waves sometimes need a helping hand. Schwarzkopf Professional is proud to introduce the new BC Curl Bounce, a new line for BC Hairtherapy designed to re-nourish and give bounce back to natural curls.

Schwarzkopf Professional continues to lead the industry in hair colour advancements. Naturally derived ESSENSITY hair colour offers 100 per cent grey coverage and is still free from ammonia, parabens, paraffin and more. ESSENSITY is the market's first high-performing hair colour that offers an odourless oil-in-cream permanent colouration. It contains the purest organic essence of grape seed oil and natural Ectoin.

Dippity-Do has teamed up with the National Hockey League Players Association (NHLPA) to bring Canadians a range of specialized hair styling products designed for active males with the launch of Dippity-Do Sport Pro Styling. An officially licensed product of the NHLPA, it performs throughout even the most intense of hockey games. This new line of specialty gels, putties, waxes, glues and pastes allow hairstyles to score big when it comes to winning style, on or off the ice.

Concealer is to be used to cover dark circles, blemishes and any other flaws that are visible. Choose the right foundation for you and make sure the colour matches your skin tone, especially around the neck area. The last thing you want is to have a colour difference. Make sure to blend it with your fingers.

M·A·C has moved ahead with a three-in-one force: powder, foundation and tinted moisturizer all together. New Studio Careblend Pressed Powders beautifies as it benefits. It gives a sheer to medium, smooth, coverage for a soft and even tone.

Eye makeup plays an important role when it comes to beauty, and each season, new beautiful trends come about. The hottest trend this season is the pastel colour palettes, which suit every women. Bright colours help achieve a vibrant complexion. Choose the colour that will suit and make you feel the best.

New this season is the launch of Annabelle 4SHOW Eyeshadows that feature countless party-ready looks with just one compact. The four palettes of beautiful quad shade combinations can be painted on wet or dry.

M·A·C has new introduced Jeanius, four new limited-life "denimized" eye shadows that are amazing to use. They are inspired by spring 2011 denim trends. The colour shades are white with silver pearl; mid-tone grey with silver pearl; mid-tone dirty blue with copper pearl; black with copper pearl.

Lancôme introduces the Ombre Absolue Minérale eye shadow palette Ultra-Lavande, a compact with variations of lavender harmonies in both warm and cool tones, contrasted with gold and silver shimmer for a hint of disco glamour. A palette of tender pinks adds the finishing touch to this beautiful collection.

Blush should have that healthy fresh look. Let your eyes and lips be the focal points. M·A·C has created the blush that not only feels light, but looks it to. Introducing M·A·C Cremeblend Blush, it starts creamy, stays creamy and proves that it can give you that glamour look you are looking for.

For women who are looking for the powder look, Lancôme Spring 2011 Color Collection, Ultra-Lavande has created a beautiful compact that resembles the look of butterflies. Butterflies Fever Blush has hues of all pastel colours, and when applied, they give that radiant blush look.

Along with the bright eyeshadows, gel and black liquid eye liners are applied thickly to the lash line. Lashes should look long and full. You can also apply liquid liner under the lower lashes to enhance the look of thicker lashes. Coloured eye-pencil liners are hot, hot, hot!

Lipstick is a must for every woman. Colours vary from soft shades to vibrant oranges and pinks. If your eyes are vibrant for day, then make your lips soft. If your lips are strong for day, then make your eyes soft. If you are going out for that big night and you want everything to be strong, then go for that daring look of strong eyes and bold lips. You will be sure to make heads turn.

The Annabelle Volumelip Lip Plumping Gloss stimulates collagen production and provides maximum hydration. Over a few weeks of daily use, it softens lips and provides a plumping effect for more luscious and fuller lips. No one will miss a word coming from those lips!

Lady Gaga is back representing M·A·C Cosmetics Viva Glam Goddess once again. M·A·C is unveiling a hot new shade of lipstick called Viva Glam (2) Light Warm Beige and a Lipglass called Light Neutral Pinked Beige.

There is no need to judge a book by its cover – except when it comes to the limited edition of Lancôme's Spring 2011 Color Collection Ultra-Lavande lipsticks.

New Orleans fragrance

OPI Pirates of the Caribbean

The casing of Le French Touch Absolu in disco-ball-style packaging is as sensuous and vibrant as the colour inside.

Fashion and makeup are an important factor to every woman, but fragrance is your affordable accessory.

Ayala Moriel Parfums launches the fragrance New Orleans. The New Orleans scent is bright, mossy and delightful. The perfume plays off of New Orleans' landscape, capturing salty notes from the lake with seaweed and ambergris, the woodsy smell of the trees with cedar moss, vetiver and amyris, as well as floral tones such as magnolia and tea olive. She says that this is a scent that can be used by both men and women. Even if you have never been to New Orleans, you are sure to appreciate it.

Juicy Couture is proud to introduce two new fragrances – Peace, Love & Juicy Couture, a scent made up of whimsical eau de parfum that brings out your inner flower child, and Couture Couture, a decadent scent mixed with love that can make the world smell good.

To complete your new spring look, OPI is pleased to introduce two new nail polish collections this spring: Femme de Cirque SoftShades, launching in April, and Pirates of the Caribbean, launching in May. Femme de Cirque by OPI has breathtaking shades, three pink hues and one sheer glitter coat that can be worn on its own or painted over any of the other lacquers. Pirates of the Caribbean by OPI is available in shades ranging from sage and lavender to khaki grey and pastel pink. These shades reflect the warm tropical settings of the Caribbean.

Spring is the time of year when many special occasions happen. Treat yourself or someone special to a variety of gifts. Here are some suggestions.

- A day at the spa
- Buy something sentimental
- Buy that perfect scent for him or her
- Buy something new in fashion
- Add a new item or items to your makeup

Patriarchate sells leasing rights to Jerusalem land

Ranit Nahum-Halevy
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Greek Orthodox Patriarchate has sold most of its leasing rights to large swaths of Jerusalem to a group of Jewish investors. The 80-million-shekel ($22.5 million US) agreement puts an end to the long draw-out land affair – at least for the next 140 years.

In the deal, signed March 10, the Patriarchate sold most of its rights to lease the land it has held in Jerusalem to a group of Jewish investors from Israel and abroad. The group includes the Ben David family, one of the wealthiest in Jerusalem, who are large property investors and partners in Givot Olam Oil Exploration.

The sale includes 85 parcels on hundreds of dunams (four dunams equals one acre) of the capital's most expensive properties, including in the very pricey neighbourhoods of Rehavia, Talbieh, Baka and Katamon.

Hundreds of projects have been built on the land, including residential and commercial. The properties include the Wolfson Towers that overlook the Knesset building, the Neve Granot neighbourhood below the Israel Museum, Liberty Bell Park, the Great Synagogue, the old Ottoman train stations, hotels, offices and residences.

The Israel Lands Administration (ILA) manages the Patriarchate's properties, in the name of the Jewish National Fund (JNF). The ILA and the Patriarchate are signed on leasing agreements through 2051, but the ILA will sign the renewed leases in the future with the group of Jewish investors.

Theofilos III, the Greek Orthodox Patriarch, signed the agreement himself, along with his deputy for financial matters.

The deal will give the buyers the ownership rights on the new land as of 2051. They have already started talks with the ILA over the conditions of the renewal of the leases in 2051.

The agreement has long-term political significance though it may not make economic sense for the buyers, said property assessor Koby Bir.

"There are those who may say the amount [paid] is too low... But, the investors bought the rights starting only another 40 years," he said. "Only then will they become the owners of the land and can sign the agreements to renew the leases," he said.

Bir said the deal was high risk. "No one promises that tomorrow morning or in a few years, the JNF will start making deals to renew the leases," he said. "But now the land is being managed by a group of Jewish investors and the Palestinian threat has been removed. We have already heard that the investors are chasing after the ILA, and [the ILA] will not just let them make any amount they demand. The ILA is in no hurry."

The story goes all the way back to just after the founding of the State of Israel. The Patriarchate, the historic owner of the land in question, signed a leasing deal with the JNF. The new country needed land to develop the new capital, but the Patriarchate adamantly refused to sell any land, and instead only agreed to lease it out.

In 1952 the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate signed the deal, which left it with formal ownership of the properties, but all the rights to use and develop the land were transferred through a long-term lease of 99 years to the JNF, until 2051.

The original terms allowed the JNF to sublease the land to various developers, who built on the properties – including thousands of homes. But the original lease stated that the Patriarchate would once again receive the full and sole rights to the properties when the lease runs out in 2051.

To prevent a situation where the residents and others using the properties would have to negotiate individually with the Patriarchate in the future, the state carried on secret negotiations for decades in an attempt to convince the former patriarch, Diodoros I, to agree to extend the lease.

But political pressure, mostly from Palestinian groups, kept Diodoros from signing. Israel was also worried that after the establishment of the Palestinian Authority, the new body would reach an agreement with the church over the land.

In early 2000, a deal was formulated by Jacob Weinroth, the attorney representing the JNF. The new lease was to have been extended to 2150 in return for $20 million. The sides even signed a letter of intent, but the deal was cancelled shortly after with the Patriarchate claiming the buyers had defrauded the church. Various repercussions from this failed deal, and the myriad accusations are still being heard in court.

Israel's economy continues to grow

Moti Bassok
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli economy is still growing strongly, the Bank of Israel's research department reported last week.

The central bank's composite state-of-the-economy index for February rose 0.4 per cent from its January level. The increase indicates that economic growth continued last month, reflected by increases in local demand and exports. Almost all components of the index showed increases, except for imports of consumer goods.

The central bank also updated the figures for January's economic growth from 0.4 per cent to 0.5 per cent.

A rival index, the Melnick index on the state of the economy, also rose in February – by 0.8 per cent. According to Prof. Rafi Melnick of the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, who prepared the index, the economy continues to grow strongly in early 2011.

Other indicators show industrial production is rising once again and has more than made up for the drop in August and September 2010.

Exports of services rose in February by 6.1 per cent, following a 3.2 per cent decline in January, the Bank of Israel reported. Imports of production inputs rose in February by 3.7 per cent after a 3.8 per cent rise in January. Exports of goods increased in February by 4.5 per cent, following a 0.6 per cent rise in January. Imports of consumer goods fell by 5.0 per cent in February, after increasing by 4.5 per cent in January.

The composite state of the economy index is a cyclical indicator for examining the direction in which real economic activity is moving, in real time, said the central bank.

It is calculated from the monthly changes in seven components that reflect different aspects of real economic activity: the indexes of manufacturing production; imports of consumer goods; imports of production in-puts; trade and services revenue; the number of employee jobs in the business sector; exports of goods (excluding agriculture, fuel, diamonds, and ships and aircraft) and exports of services (tourism, computer and know-how, communications, insurance and other business services).

Memoirist views her psychiatrist as a 'hero'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Writing a memoir about her years of depression, mania, bulimia and cutting is the most healthy thing she's ever done, says Emma Forrest, author of Your Voice in My Head.

"This is actually the healthiest I've been since I was 12 years old. I didn't write this book to help other people – I wrote it to help me," said Forrest, a native of London, England, who now lives in Los Angeles.

A journalist for London's Sunday Times at age 16 and the author of three novels, Forrest, 33, said she was always precocious. "I didn't know anyone my own age. Everyone thought I was a party girl, but I didn't drink – I was manic. Perhaps my life would have been easier with alcohol."

She moved to New York at 22 to write, she said, "and my life on the outside was envious. Secretly, though, I was self-destructive. I cut myself with razors, binged and purged, and had a series of abusive relationships. Sex didn't mean anything if it didn't hurt."

Her mother happened to call her in New York just as Forrest's roommate walked in on a suicide attempt. Afterward, Forrest's psychiatrist, the unnamed Dr. R. in the memoir, was able to help her turn her life around.

What she didn't know, however, was that Dr. R. was dying of lung cancer. "I called the office one day, and he wasn't there.

"We had worked hard together. Of course, I will always be on medication, but I learned about pattern breaking and how I can change my behaviour. He gave me tools that I will be able to draw on for the rest of my life. His is the voice I hear in my head."

Losing him, she said, was a huge crisis that she had to deal with. "He is a hero. He was a lovely confluence of medicine and faith. He believed in me when I didn't believe in myself."

Psychiatry is a wonderful tool, she said. "You may have great friends, but they are different than someone who you never see out of the context of a little room. You can sit it that room and talk only about yourself. You don't have to worry about being selfish. Finding the right psychiatrist, though, is like dating. You might not want the first one you find."

Before the book was published, said Forrest, she sent it to Dr. R's widow for approval. "She loved it. She said she read it 20 times.

"My parents are also very brave about it," she added. "They're seeing all this stuff right out there. A lot of things were surprising to them."

After moving to Los Angeles, Forrest had relationships with an award-winning writer and with an unnamed famous actor – newspaper reports say it was Colin Farrell – who, after a year of persuading her to have his baby, left her without warning.

"When I have to deal with issues, I always think about what Dr. R. would tell me. He's always my voice."

Her Judaism is important to her, she said. "At a time when I struggled with my identity, being Jewish was never a struggle. [My rabbi] has taken over for Dr. R. as a figure of wisdom. I find his words inspiring."

Now in a serious relationship, she acknowledges that she will always have bad days, "and that life can be difficult, but it is doable and it is worth it."

A Matter of Size is a small film that works

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Israeli and Japanese cultures collide and converge in the comedy, A Matter of Size.

The film, directed by Erez Tadmor and Sharon Maymon, is scheduled to open at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Cinemas on March 25.

Herzl (Itzkik Cohen), a 35-year-old resident of Ramle, is jokingly known as Mt. Herzl. The guy, frankly speaking, is corpulent. Much to his frustration, all his efforts to lose excess pounds are in vain.

The weight loss club he joins offers no solace. Its hard-as-nails director throws him out of the program. Nor, due to his hefty frame, can he keep his job as a chef in a restaurant.

He seems doomed.

Rebounding from indignity, he finds a position as a dishwasher in a Japanese restaurant. While watching a sumo wrestling match there on TV, he discovers that oversize sumo wrestlers are appreciated and honoured by Japanese fans.

It is a transcendent moment for Herzl. Sumo wrestling will give him what he has always lacked, self-esteem and respect.

Having formed a sumo club, he and his fat friends try to convince Kitano (Togo Igawa), the restaurant owner and a former sumo trainer, to be their coach.

Kitano, a fervent Zionist and a member of the pro-Israel Makuya sect, agrees to help them if they bulk up. This means they must add yet more poundage to their already flabby bodies.

In a charming sub-plot, Herzl meets and falls in love with Zahava (Irit Kaplan), who is also overweight.

At her request, Herzl promises to submit himself to a crash diet. But being faithful to the sumo regimen, he gains still more weight.

When Zahava learns that Herzl has lied to her, their relationship is thrown into jeopardy.

Can Herzl have the best of both worlds? Can he continue to be a sumo wrestler while dating Zahava?

An unusual love story, A Matter of Size is ultimately about the virtues of self-acceptance.

This small, sweet-tempered, crowd-pleasing film works. The screenplay is clear and plausible, while the performances are natural and genuine.

It's a winner on all counts.

A Matter of Size* is about self-acceptance.

CHAT grad directs Cabaret

The cast of the musical Cabaret directed by Brian Lee

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

The musical Cabaret, now at the Richmond Hill Performing Arts Centre, features several emerging Jewish actors and is directed by TannenbaumCHAT graduate Brian Lee.

The cast includes Fay Gamliel, Esther Vlessing and Beckie Saslove, who stars as Sally Bowles, the role made famous by Liza Minnelli in the 1972 feature film.

But rather than base this production on the popular movie version, Lee went back to the original book for inspiration.

"A lot of musicals these days, especially with local theatre groups, tend to try to imitate the most popular version, the one most readily available on social media like YouTube. I read and dissected the book," he says.

Cabaret is based on the book Goodbye Berlin, by Christopher Isherwood, set in 1930s Berlin.

"This book charted his chronicles as a British man in Berlin seeing the rise of Nazism, and everyone standing by and watching," Lee says.

In the book, Isherwood's character, Cliff, a writer, meets Sally Bowles, a cabaret singer at the Kit Kat Klub. The two live together in a boarding house run by a German woman, Fräulein Schneider, who is in love with a Jewish man and experiencing hardships because of it.

"We all think of World War II and the years leading up to it as black and white because we only have it as photos. What is interesting is that these years in Germany were actually rather colourful. Yes, they were completely full of social imbalance [but] filled with self-expression," Lee says.

"For this production I wanted to make sure that it was as true a representation as possible of what Germany was in those days, and that was filled to the brim with debauchery and loads of fun."

Lee, a graduate of the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is the grandson of Holocaust survivors. A recipient of a Lieutenant Governor's Community Volunteer Award for Students, he thinks directing the play has been a wonderful opportunity to have a platform from which to investigate and understand his grandparents' generation and what they went through.

"Our audiences take away more of an understanding of 1930s Germany, but on top of that, what we have staged in the production is as unbiased... as possible," he says.

"Focusing on the elements that every person in the world is flawed, we want the audience to draw their own conclusions. So in that way, it is a very different take on the show."

Lee says he finds directing musical theatre difficult work, but he enjoys the challenge.

"In plays, the characters speak and their speech can be considered realistic, but when you break out into song, you lose some of that," Lee says.

Cabaret is produced by Steppin' Out Theatrical Productions, a not-for-profit theatre company founded by Lee. It runs March 23 to 26 at the Richmond Hill Performing Arts Centre, 10268 Yonge St. For tickets call 905-787-8811, or online at www.rhcentre.ca.

Retrospective honours an innovative film director

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

Arthur Penn

You could usually expect the unexpected from Arthur Penn.

Penn, who died last year, was a movie director whose quirky, rebellious, unconventional sensibility broke new ground in Hollywood.

In iconic films such as Bonnie and Clyde and Alice's Restaurant, Penn offered viewers a fresh and occasionally subversive perspective on American society.

From March 24 to April 6, he will be the subject of a retrospective at the Bell Lightbox theatre (350 King St. W.) mounted by the Toronto International Film Festival.

Born in Philadelphia, Pa. in 1922, Penn was the son of a Jewish watchmaker. After serving in the army during World War II, he studied at the Actors Studio in New York City.

Drifting into television, then a new media, Penn worked as a floor manager at NBC before making a name for himself as a director of TV dramas.

After enjoying success on Broadway, Penn, whose brother Irving was an acclaimed fashion photographer, segued into movies.

He made his debut in 1958 as the director of The Left Handed Gun, a western starring the virtually unknown Paul Newman as a troubled youth who turns to violence in the face of rejection.

The film bombed, prompting Penn to return to Broadway, where he staged a succession of hits from The Miracle Worker to Toys in the Attic.

Called back to Hollywood, Penn was handed the plum assignment of directing the film version of The Miracle Worker, the story of Helen Keller, a blind, deaf and mute girl who's drawn out of her autistic shell by her headstrong teacher, Annie Sullivan.

The black-and-white film, starring Patty Duke as Keller and Anne Bancroft as Sullivan in Academy Award winning performances, unfolds much like a play and sometimes like a documentary as the patient and persistent Sullivan struggles to teach the stubborn and violent-prone Keller the art of communication.

A critical and commercial hit about the triumph of the human spirit, The Miracle Worker propelled Penn to stardom.

His next film, Mickey One, was a Kafkaesque foray into the dreamlike world of a standup comedian (Warren Beatty) who's on the run from criminals or, maybe, his own demons.

Influenced by French New Wave techniques and Orson Welles, Mickey One touched on themes ranging from disillusionment with success to suspicion of authority.

Penn's subsequent film, The Chase, is a thriller set in Texas and revolves around a prison break by a convict (Robert Redford) who was jailed in a miscarriage of justice.

The Chase, with a gritty screenplay by Lillian Hellman, explores high-powered motifs like corruption, adultery and racism. It features Marlon Brando as a smalltown sheriff, Jane Fonda as the convict's wife and E.G. Marshall as the town's wealthiest citizen.

Much to Penn's opposition, Sam Spiegel, the producer, re-edited The Chase. The embittered Penn went back to Broadway, learning yet again that Hollywood works in dark and mysterious ways.

But when a famous French director whom he greatly admired left the set of Bonnie and Clyde, Penn was tempted to give Hollywood another chance, particularly after he was promised the rare privilege of final cut.

A stylized Depression-era film about two American outlaws (Beatty and Faye Dunaway), Bonnie and Clyde shattered cinematic conventions on violence and sex.

Buoyed by its astonishing reception, Penn went on to direct two intensely personal movies, Alice's Restaurant and Little Big Man, both of which stamped him as a purveyor of independent film.

Alice's Restaurant, starring Arlo Guthrie, is a gentle film about a social outsider, while Little Big Man, an anti-western, stars Dustin Hoffman as the sole survivor of the Battle of the Little Bighorn.

These films were followed by Night Movies, a moody detective film that takes place in the Florida Keys, and The Missouri Breaks, a surreal, revisionist, sexually liberated western with comedic overtones starring Jack Nicholson as a slow-talking, pipe-smoking horse thief and Marlon Brando as an eccentric, cross-dressing bounty hunter.

Penn's last five films, Four Friends, Target, Dead of Winter, Penn & Teller Get Killed and Inside, were released between 1981 and 1996 and were eclectic in terms of subject matter.

Penn, in his 38-year career as a director, was something of an original, a maverick, if you will.

Virtually single-handedly, he founded what would be glowingly described as the New American Cinema, revolutionizing Hollywood's approach to violence and sex and challenging the time-honoured American narrative of the old wild west.

In short, Penn inspired and emboldened new and innovative directors from Martin Scorsese to Francis Ford Coppola.

His body of work lives on.

Ozick's latest novel places Jews into high society

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Foreign Bodies, Cynthia Ozick's sixth and possibly best novel, is modelled after The Ambassadors, a late novel (1903) by her idolized "Master," Henry James, that he considered his best work. James' novel explores what was perhaps his favourite theme: the juxtaposition of uncouth America and the more refined, cultured world of Old Europe. Ozick's aim, according to publisher Houghton Mifflin Harcourt, was to retrace The Ambassadors "as a photographic negative, in which the plot is the same but the meaning is reversed."

Ozick's book is a shimmering sea of exquisite sentences that washes over the shore of the readers' consciousness, wave after wave bearing the delightful flotsam of keen allusions, puns, symbols, metaphors and memorable phrases. ("Lili's uneaten potato lay cold and congealed on her plate like a guillotined head.") And yet, for all of Ozick's virtuosity, the meaning of Foreign Bodies seems hard to fathom.

The collision of values between Europe and America has sparked many such novelistic plots. We are reminded of Patricia Highsmith's delightfully noirish The Talented Mr. Ripley (1955), in which Tom Ripley goes to Italy to find the expat American Dickie Greenleaf, ostensibly to rescue him, but ultimately to murder and impersonate him. In the E. M. Forster novels Where Angels Fear to Tread (1905) and Room With a View (1908), the Americans are replaced by Brits who are irredeemably stodgy and stiff-mannered as compared to the passionate Italians; false versus authentic.

It is 1952 and Paris is awash with war refugees, Jewish and otherwise, the streets abuzz in a cacophony of languages. Ozick's protagonist is Beatrice Nightingale, a spinsterish New York schoolteacher who ventures to Paris to rescue her wayward nephew Julian at the behest of her distant (California) and bullying brother Marvin Nachtingall.

It seems that Marvin's gentile wife, the former Margaret Breckenridge from a family of American bluebloods, has been institutionalized and cannot regain her right mind until Julian comes home. How deftly Ozick places the children of grubby Jewish immigrant peddlers into the genteel tapestry of American high society; now it is Marvin who objects to "smelly foreigners."

Julian is one of many "imitation baby Sartres and Gides" infesting Paris, each "sitting in cafés over their inky manuscripts, an aperitif placed just so at the nearest knuckle to authenticate the parody, the foolish superannuated playacting." Despite Bea's best attempts, Julian refuses to be rescued; eventually Bea learns that he is secretly married to Lili, a Jewish refugee from Transnistria, a match certain to horrify his father. Aimless and common as a pigeon, Julian's unhappy sister, Iris, also takes flight to Paris, and lands in the bed of Dr. Montalbano, an American mountebank preying on the gullible.

Bea, fiftyish and childless, was once married to Leo Coopersmith, a composer who left her for Hollywood. Now in Paris, forced into the role of ambassador, she walks a fine line, sometimes embellishing and sometimes withholding information – even lying – as she tries to do the right thing: she is not just Marvin's passive servant. In the process she rediscovers that she has a voice and mind all her own. Back in New York, feeling empowered, she removes the grand piano from her tiny apartment, a relic of her marriage to Leo. Suddenly she can be herself!

Just as Bea unclutters her apartment, Ozick unclutters her novel of the sort of chokingly dense prose with which James stuffed The Ambassadors, which, although reputedly very fine, is still a punishingly difficult book to read. Foreign Bodies, by contrast, is refreshingly readable; Ozick's reversal of James on this point is most welcome.

While their conceptions of Europe and America differ greatly, both authors utilize the same techniques of ambiguity and fidelity to point of view in order to reveal or hide discreet shades of meaning. And the meaning of Foreign Bodies? Is it an attempt to insinuate Jews into the heart of American society, the way Dara Horn put Jewish players at centre stage in her Civil War novel, All Other Nights? An attempt to show how much the landscape had been levelled by the war? In Ozick's conception, Americans and Europeans alike (all except Bea) seem to descend to a new nadir of vacuousness. As with some good wine, a certain cloudiness remains. Even so, it seems clear that Ozick, as she attempts to mirror her idealized "Master," emerges as something of a master herself.

Freedom by Jonathan Franzen (HarperCollins).

If a lead character's Jewishness is of no concern to herself and her Jewishness has no discernible bearing on the story, the fact that she is Jewish may still offer sufficient pretext to a reviewer to extol the book's praises in the pages of a Jewish newspaper.

Patty and Walter Berglund live in a nice residential section of St. Paul, Minn., where she is the good-natured saint of her street, a perfect mother and the envied wife of a respectable lawyer. But when her teenaged son moves in with the girl next door, Patty becomes a "fury unhinged." Several hundred pages of minutely developed back-story later, we know more about the hurtful and at times destructive choices that Patty has made – and the reasons why she and Walter are the way they are.

As in Franzen's previous novel The Corrections (2001), Freedom is steeped in conversational jargon, jazz-like spontaneity and enough period allusions to make the tale a riveting contemporary social portrait with a menacing undercurrent. Freedom is about the freedom to choose, the dire consequences that can result when wrong choices are made, and the capacity of the human heart to heal.

Maccabi president unveils plans for long-term success

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Tom Bacher has been involved with the Maccabi organization ever since he was a softball player with the Canadian team at the 1985 Maccabiah Games in Israel. Over the years, he's heard a comment over and over again: "Stop being an event and start being a movement."

As president of Maccabi Canada, he's now in a position to do something about it. Since taking over the reins of the organization a year ago, Bacher and other Maccabi executives have been putting in place the personnel and laying the groundwork for a new strategic vision for the organization. No longer will it be prominent only during the Games and in the year before, when it frantically scrambles to raise money, but it will develop an enduring presence and central role in Canadian Jewish sporting life, he said.

At the same time it will retain as its mission the creation and enhancement of a connection to the State of Israel and the Jewish people through sports. It will promote the idea that the Maccabi experience instils great values in kids and develops community leaders. "Maccabi has to become a step in the Jewish journey," Bacher said.

By any external measure, the Maccabi movement has had some successes. Every four years, the organization seems to set a new record for the number of athletes it sends to Israel. At the last Games in 2009, some 450 Canadians participated. Canadians won 12 gold medals, 14 silver and 37 bronze, finishing behind only Israel and the United States in the overall tally.

All well and good, but for Bacher, there's a bigger message that has to be communicated to young Jews – something beyond athletic achievement. Young people today still don't realize the life-altering impact that participation in the Games can have, he said.

Looking back at his own experience, Bacher said he felt personal pride in making the Canadian team.

"When I got to Israel and went to the opening ceremonies in front of 50,000 people, where [Olympic gold medalist] Mark Spitz lit the torch and the children of [slain Israeli] Munich athletes ran behind him, all of a sudden, it became pride in being Jewish, pride of where I was. Kids don't know that. Kids don't know there's a lifetime to remember."

A key component of the plans outlined by Bacher was substantial changes to the Maccabiah Games experience. On previous occasions, athletes arrived shortly before the Games, competed and left soon thereafter.

Bacher is planning to get the team to Israel five days before the Games begin, hold a training camp, encourage team camaraderie, and allow athletes a greater chance to see the country.

The United States, Britain and Australia have already adopted that model, he said.

Going further, Bacher is going to ask athletes to commit to volunteer work – such as holding clinics in the athletes' sports – while in Israel.

"I want our athletes to give back to society. We're in a fortunate situation and we're able to give back more. That will also make it a more rounded experience."

Also being considered is a proposal to team up with Birthright and have some Canadian athletes join the program after the Games. Imagine the impact one month in Israel will have on the participant, Bacher suggested.

Maccabi Canada is soliciting the involvement of past athletes to help get its message out. One alumnus, Karen James, who competed in swimming at the 1965 Maccabiah and the 1972 Olympic Games, has addressed large groups of students at Jewish day schools, he said.

The organization "wants Maccabi alumni to connect with us, come to events, help Maccabi Canada work with kids, coach them, encourage them," Bacher, a physician, said.

One of the next events on the Maccabi calendar will be a picnic and sports competition at Camp Robin Hood on June 12. Alumni and supporters are being invited to the event, which will include the "Maccabi Canada Sports Challenge," a four-hour competition in a variety of games, including softball, basketball, soccer and beach volleyball.

In December, Canadian athletes competing in basketball, soccer, softball, golf, tennis, squash, swimming and table tennis will travel to Sao Paulo, Brazil, for the Pan American Maccabi Games. An estimated 2,500 athletes from 25 countries are expected at the event, Bacher said.

Plans are also afoot to stage a sports media dinner sometime next year, and Maccabi Canada is joining with its counterpart in the United States to push Maccabiah organizers to include ice hockey at the next Games in 2013.

But beyond the large scale events, Maccabi Canada is aiming to go to the grassroots and help develop young athletes. Maccabi alumni can instruct other coaches in training techniques and inspire young athletes.

It's also developing relationships with JCC Chai Sports, which is geared to teens and pre-teens, and it is planning to introduce an "adopt-an-athlete" program to raise funds and defray the $7,500 cost that has kept some top athletes from participating in the past.

Bacher is convinced the new approach will lead to a self-sustaining, permanent organization. "We have to show people it's fun, it instils great values in kids and Israel is [a prize] at the end. If we do, supporters will stay with us," he said.

BIALIK B CHAMPS: Bialik Hebrew Day School's junior hockey team pose with their B division first-place trophy from the recent Yitzhak Rabin Tournament. Bialik beat Associated Posluns in the championship game by a score of 7-2. The Yitzhak Rabin Tournament is held every March and brings together teams from Jewish day schools across Toronto.

Community leader decries lack of outrage after square named for terrorist

JTA

NEW YORK — Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, slammed governments, including the Barack Obama administration, for not denouncing the naming of a square in a West Bank town after a terrorist.

Hoenlein made his comments last Thursday in New York at a memorial service at Congregation Kehilat Jeshurun in Manhattan for the parents and three children of the Fogel family who were murdered March 11 in the West Bank settlement of Itamar.

"If governments, even our own, do not stand out and shriek and condemn and take action when they see this kind of action by the Palestinian Authority and their representatives" – and the incitement continues despite repeated promises – then "we must make sure that our voices are heard," Hoenlein said. "We have to demand accountability and that there will be consequences."

Hoenlein compared those behind the killings to Nazis, and said they were "likely driven by a vicious hatred fostered by the continuous anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incitement of their political and religious leaders," starting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad.

In an official March 13 ceremony, Palestinians renamed a town square in Al-Bireh, near Ramallah, for Dalal Mughrabi, who was involved in killing 37 Israelis. Members of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah faction were on hand for the unveiling of the plaque in her memory, although no PA government officials attended the ceremony, according to Reuters.

Malcolm Hoenlein

Mughrabi was killed in a 1978 bus hijacking on Israel's coastal road. She had directed the hijacking of two buses on the coastal road between Haifa and Tel Aviv, which led to the murder of 37 Israelis, including 13 children.

The naming of the square, which took place just two days after the murders in the West Bank, drew a muted response from the White House – relatively low-level officials said they were seeking clarification on the matter and denounced incitement by "all parties."

Those spokespeople, at the White House and at the State Department, responded only after calls from JTA. They said reports that Palestinian Authority officials attended the renaming of the square for a terrorist were "disturbing."

Hoenlein also decried responses around the world to the murders, describing them as "a balanced statement or at most a lip-service condemnation." He said, "Where is the outrage? Where is the indignation?"

Ruth and Udi Fogel and three of their six children – Yoav, 11; Elad, 4; and Hadas, 3 months – were stabbed to death as they slept in their Itamar home. Israeli and Palestinian forces are still searching for the perpetrators.

The White House response, which condemned the murders as "terrorism" and said that "there is no possible justification for the killing of parents and children in their home," was issued in the name of the White House spokesperson, Jay Carney.

Obama has yet to pronounce on the killings, although U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton condemned what she called the "inhuman" killings "in the strongest possible terms."

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) and the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA) also issued statements saying the State Department statement was inadequate.

"We respectfully suggest that a forceful, unequivocal and public condemnation of incitement must be heard around the world and should also be directed to all Palestinians through their media," the ADL said in a letter to Clinton.

The ZOA said the Obama administration had "refused" to condemn the attack despite pleas from the group and others. "To our shock and dismay, President Obama and Secretary Clinton have refused to condemn this vile, almost Nazi-like Fatah ceremony," ZOA president Morton Klein said in a statement. "We condemn him for this disgraceful failure and silence."

Pro-Israel officials, who asked not to be named, have also said they were irked by the State Department's expression of "deep concern" after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced 500 new housing starts in West Bank settlements as a response to the murders.

Mainstream Palestinian leaders have condemned the killings.

British authority upholds complaint against Travel Palestine ad

JTA

LONDON — Complaints against an advertisement for travel to Palestine were upheld by the British Advertising Standards Authority.

In a March 16 ruling, the authority said the Travel Palestine ad should not be published again as it is currently constituted.

The advertisement, which was published in National Geographic Traveler magazine, read that "Palestine is a land rich in history with a tradition of hospitality. From the famous cities of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Hebron, Jericho, Nablus, and Gaza, the Palestinian people welcome you to this Holy Land."

It also says, "Palestine lies between the Mediterranean Coast and the Jordan River… It takes a visit to this wonderful country to appreciate the most palpable facet of its culture: the warmth and humour of the Palestinian people. Join a long list of visitors over the centuries who have seen the beauty of this land."

Some 149 complaints were filed with the Advertising Standards Authority, saying that Palestine is not a recognized country, that the advertisement suggested that all of the land mentioned was Palestinian, and that Jerusalem and the other cities mentioned are Palestinian.

The authority agreed that the ad was misleading in saying that the cities listed were accepted as Palestinian – although it did point out that the "status of Jerusalem is in dispute" – but did not uphold the complaints that the ad claimed Palestine was a recognized country, or that the whole area between the Mediterranean Coast and the Jordan River is Palestinian.

Organic farmer cultivates health in the community

Laura Stricker
Special to The CJN

Are you craving cucumber? Salivating over spinach? Aching for asparagus?
Then Daniel Hoffmann is the man for you.

Hoffmann, 35, is a social worker and organic farmer who established The Cutting Veg (TCV), a community health promotion enterprise with a focus on organic farming.

"[The Cutting Veg] cultivates personal, social, environmental and economic health through organic agriculture. We're really trying to impact the community in a variety of positive ways," he said.

One of the ways Hoffmann is doing this is with The Cutting Veg's Community Supported Agriculture (CSA) program. In the program, founded in 2008, people become members in the farm for a season, giving them access to a weekly share of the harvest, all grown at TCV's farm in Brampton, Ont.

A regular share costs $27 a week and a large share is $37. The produce changes depending on what's in season, and consists of veggies and fruit that were harvested that day. The program runs from June to the end of October each year.

Produce pickup locations include the Pri Adamah CSA at Temple Sinai; the Holy Sprouts CSA at Holy Blossom Temple and the Kavanah Garden CSA on Lebovic Campus Drive, near Bathurst Street and Rutherford Road.

"[The produce] is whatever's in season. So, in spring, you're getting the cool weather crops, things like peas and green onions and swiss chard and kale. As the summer comes, you get into the heat lovers, the tomatoes and corn and cucumbers and zucchini and peppers and eggplants. And then when the fall comes, that's when you move back into the cool weather crops."

Jewish CSAs are pretty common, Hoffmann said, with more than 60 in North America and four in Toronto. The impact they have on people, he added, is significant.

"I'm really proud of how we've been able to touch people's lives, whether it's through the CSAs, where their quality of life is improved through having a relationship with the farm and making eating locally and organically more part of their daily lives, or by coming out to the farm and participating in the growing process," he said, referring to TCV's interns and volunteers.

Hoffmann, who has been farming since 2000, started doing it because he wanted to grow his own food.

"When I was doing my degree in social work, I realized that if I wanted to make a difference in the world, the best way to start was with myself. I needed to be the healthiest person I could be," he said.

"Part of being the healthiest person I could be is to be self-reliant and self-sustaining."

Hoffmann enjoyed growing his own food so much that he decided to make a career of it. He also feels good knowing that he is making a positive impact on the local community.

"I'm really driven to participate in tikkun olam, or repairing of the world. From my professional life, I wanted to be part of something that was really healthy at its roots. Having an organic farm really does cultivate health in the community.

"For me, being Jewish is largely participating in tikkun olam. So if I can connect Jewish folks with simple ways to have a healthy relationship with food and thus enrich their quality of life while making a difference in the world, that's really meaningful for me."

Altogether, The Cutting Veg has four different community programs.

There's the organic produce, which is distributed through the CSAs and farmers markets. The Brampton farm's Global Garlic Project involves growing about 20 varieties of garlic from various places in the world, including Israel, Ukraine and Russia.

TCV also offers food coaching, working with individuals, families, groups and organizations to develop their relationship with food, and does workshops as well.

The Cutting Veg provides wellness counselling, drawing on Hoffmann's experience in counselling and social work. "[It's] basically one-on-one counselling with individuals to help them cultivate more health and wellness in their life," he said.

"Those four streams of programming are all geared back toward that one mission of cultivating personal, social, economic and environmental health."

Hoffmann is pleased that so many people are getting involved with The Cutting Veg and the CSA program, mentioning the growing membership.

"The first year we did the CSA there were 55 members. Last year [we had] 175 members, and this year we're anticipating between 400 and 500 members."

As TCV continues to grow, he hopes that more of the Jewish community will get involved.

"I really want the Jewish community to know about this opportunity to get involved with the Community Supported Agriculture."

For more information on the CSAs and how to become a member, visit www.thecuttingveg.com.

'Goth' playwright shows her 'true colours'

The first play I wrote in Canada was staged in a well-known Toronto theatre this month. It was an amazing experience. I, a newcomer, watched my lines come alive, and in English.

Thank you, my faithful readers, who recognized me and came to congratulate me. You all told me you had come to the show because you loved my columns, you said it was a well-written show, and you showered me with love and affection, which made me giddy for days after.

New to Canada

Nina Shenhav

I appreciate your faith in me, and I promise there's more where this play came from – and even this one, you haven't heard the last of...

During the audition process, I spotted my two stars right away. First, was the actor Ron Boyd (Paul, the Canadian). The man is a walking humour bomb. The moment he entered, he owned the room. Ron had a role in the CTV show Corner Gas and has acted in many other shows. His charisma is palpable. He was my lead character, and boy, did Boyd deliver the goods. Watching his unique interpretation of the character was more than a delight!

My second star was Richard Hoffman (David, the Israeli), who, among other roles, is a panellist on the CP24 show Hot Properties. When I saw him, I knew he was my David. He is handsome, and had this power of making my words really sound authentic. During intermission, I overheard two couples mistakenly saying: "The Israeli character is based on Nina's husband...'cause that's how Meir comes across in her columns..."

My Meir says he's not that submissive, but who listens to him anyway?

So, please remember those two names.

I remember the first time my Israeli play was staged in Tel Aviv. I was so excited that day. I booked an appointment at the hair salon and went out with this super chopped "do." I bought a new tight, sexy skirt, and I decided to dye my fair eyebrows, and was left with two frightening, dark worms on my whitish forehead. I also tried a new lipstick, which turned out to give me an allergic reaction. Oh, well... two seconds before I entered the theatre, my sexy skirt split, and I had to borrow Meir's dark, huge jacket to cover my outstanding behind. Picture this: super short "do," swollen lips, black spots above the eyes, and a big man's smoking jacket. I was not smokin', not at all. Naturally, I had to go on stage and say my thanks.

The next day, the local paper included flattering comments about the show and, what do you know, the "goth" playwright. "It was such a genuine surprise to discover the dark, sombre artist, who wrote such funny material, yet, somehow, was not afraid to show her deep, dour, true colours," the paper said. So go figure...

Sylvia

It was 3:45 a.m. and I sat behind the curtain, with Wendy, her caregiver, in an emergency-ward room.

Sylvia had just been moved from one room to another, and I believe she'd had enough of that. Until then, my aunt's breathing had been difficult.

The doctor had told us, at 12:35 a.m., that Sylvia was very sick and might not survive the night.

Urban Writer

Avrum Rosensweig

Over 94 years, she had fought gargantuan physical battles, and nothing the doctor could say would have convinced me or her other loved ones that she couldn't beat this, too. The doctor seemed too human to know.

Sylvia had a mask over her mouth and nose. We watched as her breathing slowed. There were short intervals – perhaps four seconds – between every breath. Each breath seemed more peaceful than the one before.

I watched my aunt closely. I felt a sense of honour knowing her life was about over on this Earth and that I was her witness. I felt as if my family and her biological mother were bookends to her life.

As the intervals between breaths became longer – seven seconds – I considered that my aunt had been two years old when she lost her mother. I thought about the stories we had been told of Sylvia being sent to live with her uncle and aunt, and then later returned to her father, to become a stepsister to three boys (one of whom was my father).

I watched, in my mind, Sylvia dance and saw her paint the white swan/ballerina that hung in my memories. They were Sylvia. She was graceful and elegant.

I was watching someone dying. Have you? Since then, I've spoken to people who have shared that experience, and they say it is transformative. They tell me that when we watch someone die, a piece of us goes with them and therefore it's important to eat heartily at the shivah – to remind ourselves we are still alive and the life force rages inside of us.

Sylvia was breathing more infrequently. Her mouth was now open.

I knew instinctively that she was dying. I knew it, even though I had only seen a bird die. I watched her make the decision to go and commit to it no matter how hard Wendy tried to hold her back. Wendy cried as Sylvia left. She massaged her feet, and dabbed a cloth over her face, wiping away the signs of illness. She loved Sylvia so very much.

And I was joyful. Really! My family and I had seen Sylvia suffering for many years, not get out of bed. Now she was out of pain and that was everything.

Sylvia stopped breathing, or so it seemed. The doctor touched her and said to us, "She is in her last moments of life."

Such a thing to hear. I whispered in her ear: "Shema Yisrael HaShem Elokeinu HaShem Echad" and told her to go.

I said, "Your mother, father, brother, husband and Dorothy, your old friend, and cousin, are waiting for you. Go."

And she did. The moment had come and there was no dramatic exhale, only a seamless transition from life to death, to the afterlife. I didn't detect the line between life and death. It wasn't there.

Sylvia died peacefully at 4:05 a.m. She lay there, oh so beautifully, until the funeral home came for her. The doctors, nurses and other patients were respectful. My family was oh so sad. They had kept Sylvia going.

I had watched her die. Sylvia Fine was gone.

Shoah monument law given royal assent

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A bill to create a National Holocaust Monument finally became law last Friday, mere hours before it would have died on the order table as a result of the federal election call.

Bill C-442, An Act to Establish a National Holocaust Monument, was granted royal assent by the Senate after impassioned pleas for its swift passage through the upper chamber were made by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canadian Yad Vashem Society last Thursday.

The bill has been tabled in Parliament in various forms by MPs since 2007 – as Liberal bills C-547 and C-238 in 2008 and 2009, respectively. The current adopted draft was introduced in the House as a private member's bill by Conservative MP Tim Uppal in September 2009 at the behest of Environment Minister Peter Kent.

However, it's actually the culmination of years of work by Laura Grossman, a public administration student at the University of Ottawa who is minoring in Canadian Jewish studies.

Kent was unable to sponsor the private members bill himself because he's a cabinet minister.

Born and raised in Thornhill, Ont., Grossman, now 23, began lobbying hard for a monument four years ago, and brought the idea to Kent as her riding MP. She is also the executive director of the Canadian Memorial Holocaust Project.

Speaking to The CJN immediately after the bill's enactment into law, Grossman said she was "ecstatic."

"It's such an amazing thing that the government made this such a top priority that it received royal assent... before a possible election was called. I'm very grateful. Very happy. Very excited," she said.

Grossman noted that according to the bill's stipulations, a lay committee must now be struck to begin planning and deciding on how the monument will be designed, on fundraising mechanisms and to start discussions with the National Capital Commission (NCC) on where the monument will eventually be erected.

Toronto volunteer aids victims of terror attack

JERUSALEM — When a bomb exploded at a crowded bus stop across from the Binyanei Hauma – Jerusalem International Convention Center last Wednesday afternoon, Chaya Kaye, 19, from Toronto, was waiting at a bus stop nearby.

The Sherut Leumi (National Service) volunteer had just left her place of internship, Shaare Zedek Medical Center, and was waiting for the No. 13 bus to take her to Binyanei Hauma to meet a friend.

"All of a sudden, I had this strange feeling, and then I heard the ambulances," said Kaye, who started her one-year volunteer program in the hospital's geriatric ward in September after graduating from Ulpanat Orot, a girls secondary school in Toronto. She called her friend, a seminary student, who was directly across the street from the blast.

"She was in shock. Everyone was. There was tons of traffic and screaming," Kaye says. She ran the normally 20-minute walk to the site, to be with her friend.

CJC Lauds Funding

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress praised the $1.6 million in permanent funding pledged to the Security Infrastructure Program in last week's federal budget. The initiative – which provides up to 50 per cent of the cost of security infrastructure projects at schools, houses of worship and community centres, up to $100,000 – was established in 2007 as a three-year, $3-million pilot program to help communities targeted by hate-motivated crime. Congress had lobbied for secure funding for the program.

Israel Trips Tallied

OTTAWA — For the second year in a row, Israel came second to Taiwan as the most popular destination for junketing MPs. Ten MPs and their spouses – including seven Tories – took trips to Israel sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and worth $90,500. Twenty MPs went to Taiwan, among them 15 Tories, Canadian Press reported, citing figures from the conflict of interest and ethics commissioner's office. Turkey and Paris registered eight trips each.

WORLD

Jail Term Sought

BERLIN — State prosecutors in Munich are seeking a six-year jail sentence for accused Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk. The request came in closing arguments March 22. A verdict is expected in May after a 1-1/2 year trial. Prosecutors said evidence shows Demjanjuk, 90, actively took part in murdering 27,900 Jews in the Nazi death camp Sobibor in Poland in 1943. Demjanjuk's lawyer said the Ukraine native was taken prisoner by the Nazis and forced to train as an SS guard. Demjanjuk immigrated to the United States after the war and lived in suburban Cleveland. He was later stripped of his citizenship for lying about his Nazi past. A death sentence against him was overturned in Israel after the Supreme Court found reasonable doubt he was the notorious "Ivan the Terrible" guard at Treblinka. In 2009, he was deported from the United States to Germany to face the Sobibor charges.

Israeli Profs Win Cdn. Gairdner Awards

TORONTO — Hebrew University of Jerusalem medical professor Howard Cedar and biochemistry professor Aharon Razin are two of the five 2011 winners of the Canada Gairdner International Awards, presented annually to researchers from around the world for outstanding contributions to medical science.

Both Cedar and Razin are members of the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC) at Hebrew U's faculty of medicine. They're the first Hebrew U professors to win the Gairdner Awards. The Gairdner Foundation created them to honour work that contributes significantly to improving the quality of life.

Cedar and Razin are being honoured for their contributions to the control of gene expression and cancer research. The pair is renowned for explaining the role of DNA methylation in the biological function of higher organisms. In 2008, they won Israel's prestigious Wolf Prize in Medicine for their research.

Razin, a Tel Aviv native, has been a Hebrew U faculty member since 1971. Cedar, a native of New York, came to Israel in 1973 and joined Hebrew U's medical faculty.

The awards will be presented in October in Toronto.

BGU Ties Cut

JOHANNESBURG — The University of Johannesburg's (UJ) faculty senate voted March 23 to cut ties with Israel's Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. In a secret ballot, 72 members voted in favour of ending a memorandum of understanding between the schools, with 45 voting against. After a deal to collaborate on biotechnology and water purification projects was announced in 2009, several Johannesburg faculty members protested, complaining of "Israeli apartheid." Last October, the faculty senate passed a resolution requiring the two institutions to amend the memorandum to include Palestinian universities and researchers and said ties would be cut if the conditions weren't met by spring. UJ also said at the time that it wouldn't engage in activities with BGU that had direct or indirect military implications. The boycott was championed by Nobel laureate Desmond Tutu and at least 400 other prominent South African figures, who signed a petition calling on UJ academics and students to end ties with BGU.

Women to be counted in Beth Tzedec minyan

Frances Kraft
Staff Reporter

Rosh Chodesh Nisan – next Tuesday, April 5 – marks not only a change on the Jewish calendar, but also a turning point in the role of women at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the shul's senior rabbi, has issued a responsum permitting women at Beth Tzedec to be counted as part of the minyan.

The new policy will be implemented next week, making Beth Tzedec only the third Conservative congregation in the GTA to allow women to be counted for the prayer quorum necessary for mourners to recite Kaddish, as well as for certain other aspects of the service.

The two other egalitarian congregations – Beit Rayim Synagogue, and B'nai Shalom Congregation of Halton-Peel, a 25-family congregation that meets in Oakville – are affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ).

At Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, women can have Torah honours but are not counted in the minyan. Women's ritual participation is more limited in most GTA Conservative synagogues.

Rabbi Bach Frydman-Kohl

Beth Tzedec, a former member of USCJ, was one of three Toronto synagogues to end its affiliation with the Conservative congregational umbrella in 2008.

At the time, Gary Mansfield, a past president, told The CJN the USCJ dues policy left "virtually no money" for synagogue programming, but that the shul was still Conservative and would continue to support other Conservative organizations. The congregation was the largest USCJ congregation in North America, with more than 2,600 families in 2008.

In late 2008, it became one of four synagogues to form the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues, but opted out of the new organization in late 2010 to become unaffiliated. Organizational dues would be redirected toward shul expenses and growth, Beth Tzedec's president Norman Kahn told The CJN at the time.

The new policy of counting women in the minyan came about as part of the shul's strategic planning process over the past year and a half, Kahn said in an interview last week.

"The one question that came up more than any other was the role of women in public prayer," he said, recalling town hall meetings that were held to discuss "all aspects of what our priorities should be."

As a result, the board asked Rabbi Frydman-Kohl a year and a half ago to see if there was a way to expand the role of women and be "consonant with Halachah."

Both Kahn and the rabbi – in a phone interview from Jerusalem, where he is on sabbatical until the end of April – stressed that the tshuvah (responsum) is specific to Beth Tzedec.

For the past 17 years, women at Beth Tzedec have received Torah honours. Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's 1994 responsum at the time regarding Torah reading and honours opened the door for women to receive aliyot (as long as men were also called to the Torah), to carry the Torah, to lift it for hagbah, to roll the Torah scroll and tie the Torah sash for glilah, and to open the ark to remove or replace the Torah.

Until then, women had been permitted aliyot only under certain conditions, such as at a child's bar or bat mitzvah.

Of elections here and there

Canadians will be electing a new federal government on May 2. For some, an election campaign is a time of great excitement. For others, it is six weeks of great irritation. But every media outlet, to be sure, will be mobilizing to provide coverage. We will be, too.

The ongoing political storms throughout the Middle East are a poignant, perfect reminder of how wonderful is the method of the democratic West for changing governments.

Elections are inelegant, infuriating for their overt partisan posturing, and too embroidered with exaggeration and theatre. Yet, as Sir Winston Churchill famously reminded us, however imperfect democracy, it is far better than the alternative.

From the editor's desk...

Encouraging our readers to vote, enabling our readers to read the explanations of policies and issues from the candidates and party leaders themselves is a very important task for our newspaper, indeed for all newspapers and media in democracies. One can add, without overstating the case, that to do so is a key duty of all serious and fair-minded media in a democratically ruled country.

We undertake that duty with great awareness of its importance to democracy society.

Elsewhere in this edition of The CJN, staff political reporter Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf explains to our readers the nature and extent of the election coverage that we will provide.

There are certain aspects of our intended coverage as explained by Levy-Ajzenkopf that must be emphasized.

• Much to the disappointment of many of our readers, The CJN will not advocate on behalf of one party or another. This has always been the policy of the paper in non-referendum elections. It will not change for the upcoming election.

• Because of the date of the election, we will be publishing four editions of the paper – not including this one – prior to election day. Given that we are a weekly publication, the spare number of editions available to us prior to election day places rather significant burdens upon our reporters who will be assigned to profile the ridings and the candidates we will be covering.

• Adding to the pressure under which our reporters and freelancers will be working to bring coverage of the election is the intervention of the holiday of Pesach.

The Pesach edition of The CJN – April 21 – will be sent to press on Monday, April 18. That night is the first seder of the holiday. Our office will be closed early on that day. It will also be closed the next two days, Tuesday and Wednesday, the first days of the holiday. We will return to work on Thursday April 21. The following day, however, Friday April 22, our offices will be again closed for the statutory Easter holiday.

The following Monday and Tuesday, April 25 and 26, the last two days of Pesach, our offices will be closed again.

Thus, the April 28 edition of The CJN, the last one before election day, will go to press fully one week earlier, namely on Thursday, April 21. But we will have only one day (April 21) that week – the week of Pesach – to produce and complete the April 28 edition, the pre-election day issue.

It will not be easy.

But we will, nevertheless, in accordance with the gravity of the duty upon us and the high priority we attach to that duty, provide excellent coverage of the election to our readers.

One area of the world where, as suggested above, elections are more a nuisance and a concession to public relations than the central pillar of the democratic structure, is the Middle East. Last week, The CJN reported that Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas was ready and eager and planning to travel to Gaza to effect a reconciliation with his hated adversary, Hamas. "I am ready to go to Gaza... to end the split and form a new government," Abbas proclaimed to his followers in Ramallah.

On the streets of Ramallah and Gaza City two weeks ago, Palestinians demonstrated their desire for Fatah, the majority PA party, and Hamas to come together in some sort of relaxed, political, Kumbaya-singing marshmallow roast. Thus, Abbas made his pronouncement. In Gaza, however, Hamas sentries shot at the demonstrators they knew to be Fatah supporters. It didn't appear that Hamas was as keen to reconcile as Fatah.

As if to prove the point, senior members of the Hamas military wing last weekend told Abbas' aides that they would not guarantee the Fatah leader's safety if he visited the Gaza Strip. Not surprisingly, PA officials interpreted these statements negatively, even as a threat to their leader. Abbas' unity pilgrimage to Gaza has been called off, at least for the time being.

Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East. Recent events prove it. Ongoing Hamas and Fatah machinations confirm it. As we vote next month in our own elections, this democratic kinship that we share with Israel, bears remembering and treasuring.

Markham councillor takes aim at IAW

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

The lone Jewish town councillor for the Town of Markham is trying to get Israeli Apartheid Week banned from the York University campus.

On March 21, Howard Shore, councillor for Markham Ward 2, introduced a motion calling on the town council to officially condemn Israeli Apartheid Week at York.

"We have a moral right and obligation to stand up to threats of antisemitism and unfounded attacks against the State of Israel," Shore, a York alumnus, said in a statement.

Howard Shore

"Markham is the most diverse municipality in all of Canada. We set the standard for inclusiveness and are stronger because of the different cultures and communities which make up our town."

In February, Markham and the university became partners in a life-sciences business incubator project known as the Markham Convergence Centre.

Shore felt that as friendly business partners with York, the town might be able to exercise "a little moral suasion" with it on the subject of IAW.

"It's one good friend speaking to another," he said.

The day after submitting the motion, council wrangled with its wording, apparently not wanting to single out the university.

According to a March 22 report on YorkRegion.com, Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti said his town has a "'terrific and amazing' relationship with York University one he wouldn't want to jeopardize by mentioning the university in the motion."

The report added that Scarpitti thought it would be "appropriate" to take more time to review the information and have further dialogue with the university.

Council deferred voting on Shore's motion until next month.

In May, the Town of Markham, in collaboration with the Regional Municipality of York, York University and the law firm Miller Thomson, is scheduled to send a delegation of councillors and business leaders to attend the Israel Life Science Industry Biomed conference in Tel Aviv May 20 to 29.

Shore is scheduled to go on the trip along with Scarpitti, Councillor Carolina Moretti, who chairs Markham's economic development committee, and the town's manager of special projects in economic development.

Shore's motion was accompanied by deputations from various representatives of the Jewish community and other political figures, including Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress; Emily Berg and Joel Pearl of Hillel of Greater Toronto; Thornhill Conservative MPP Peter Shurman, and Karen Mock, federal Liberal candidate for Thornhill.

Also in attendance at the March 21 council meeting was the deputy consul general of Israel, Hadas Wittenberg.

The CJN launches election coverage

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

On Saturday, the prime minister asked the governor general to dissolve parliament and the latest federal election began.

The CJN will, as always, profile the ridings of greatest interest to the Jewish community. We will attempt to speak with all the major party candidates in these ridings, give you thought-provoking pieces to mull over and provide readers with the most comprehensive coverage possible.

Additionally, the paper is lining up interviews with all the major party leaders, so that they can speak directly to you about their thoughts on Jewish community issues.

This time around, the election comes right after the Passover holiday. As you will read in the column From the Editor's Desk, this scheduling will cause a production crunch for the paper, meaning our last issue prior to voting day –May 2 – will go to press a full week before the vote.

Nevertheless, The CJN will, as it always has, endeavour to give you the news you need during Election 2011.

New Mortgage Opportunities Abound

Dear Fellow and Potential Investors:

As our 2000 investors know, we occasionally close the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund to new money in line with a shortage of good lending opportunities.

We have now reopened the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund as of March 1 due to a robust pipeline of quality, new investment opportunities in the Canadian commercial real estate market. As we will be funding a number of new first mortgages over the next several months, we are now open to additional investments from both existing and new investors.

We invite you to attend a Seminar on April 13 at our offices to learn how, on behalf of investors, we successfully manage over 100 commercial first mortgages in Canada. Since inception the Fund has produced consistent annual compounded returns of 8.5% to 10.5%.

The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund is an excellent choice for those who are planning their future retirement or who are already retired, due to its focus on delivering an attractive yield consistently, month after month.

Thank you for your trust and confidence in Romspen's management team. We look forward to seeing you on April 13. If you are unable to make it to the Seminar, you can call 1.800.494.0389 for an information package.

Assad's turn to squirm

Now it is the turn of the streets of Syria to stir and simmer in discontent. Emboldened by the courage of so many of the oppressed peoples in the Arab world, "ordinary" Syrians last week began marching, too, shouting their rage at the Ba'athist regime that has ruled over them with a heavy iron fist for 48 years.

President Bashar Assad, the leader of the Ba'ath Party of Syria, was appointed to his current role in accordance with his father Hafez's wishes. As well as inheriting the position from his father, the son also inherited his father's methods: brutalizing his people in a whisper-dominated, frightened society with his ruthless secret police.

In February 1982, Hafez Assad killed tens of thousands of his own people in the city of Hama. Outside of Assad's army generals who tallied the dead, no one knows the true number of Syrians slaughtered by the Syrian strongman.

As of this writing, dozens of Syrians protesting for their freedom have been killed by Bashar's security forces. At least 55 were believed to have been killed in and around the city of Daraa by the secret police and special military forces who were called in to reprise the brutality of their secret police forebears a generation ago. But of course, the temper of the Arab world, is different than it was in 1982. Moreover, the state of modern technology tolerates less hiding of dirty secrets than was the case nearly 30 years ago.

Bashar is now scrambling to secure his Alawite minority dictatorship while feigning some inchoate reforms for the benefit of his roiling streets, Al Jazeera and perhaps, too, U.S. President Barack Obama.

His spokesperson, Bouthaina Shaaban, advised Al Jazeera on Sunday that her suddenly conscience-stricken boss, would "absolutely" revoke the emergency police state laws, which were imposed by the Ba'ath Party in 1963, the year in which the Ba'athists violently seized power.

While Shaaban was reassuring Al Jazeera, if not actually the Syrian people, Assad's fighters were being reinforced in Daraa and in Latakia, where tensions were rising.

If they were not reassured by Shaaban, however, the Syrian people could take comfort in the heartfelt endorsement of the character of their empathetic ruler by Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who called Bashar a "humanist" and a "brother."

U.S. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates was not as supportive as Chavez. Gates urged the Syrian army to "empower a revolution" as the army had done in Egypt.

If Assad the younger feels his regime is threatened, he will resort to even more murder and mischief than he has already. The West and Israel must be on its guard. He will attempt to distract western eyes by causing trouble for the Jewish state.

Members of terror gangs believed responsible for scores of bombings in Israel and the West Bank over a 20-month period were rounded up by Israeli security forces, the army disclosed. All the gangs were associated with El Fatah, the terrorist arm of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Mourns closing of She'arim

On seeing the headline "New day school program serves learning disabled" (March 24), my first reaction was one of sadness. It brought back memories of a wonderful school that existed for 25 years, that served the Jewish children of our community who have learning disabilities and that was closed in June of 2008.

Yes, I am talking about the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre. I, as a parent of a child who attended that school for six years, remember sitting in a town hall meeting in the now non-existent Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, crying with fellow parents, teachers and administrators when we learned of the closing of She'arim. My child was in the last graduating class before the school closed. He is now at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Wallenberg campus, and thriving. In fact, three years later, he still talks about the skills that he acquired at She'arim, which help him today to maintain his honour-roll status and will continue to help him for many years to come.

Here we had a school that existed for 25 years, with teachers who were not just teachers but also second parents and friends to these children. Why did the powers that be feel the need to fix something that was not broken? Now, only three years later, Hebrew day schools have found the need to develop a "new" day school program to serve children with learning disabilities!

Canada shouldn't contribute to UN

Hillel Neuer is to be congratulated on his excellent and informative article "UN human rights chief must be held accountable" (March 17). The hypocrisy and anti-Israeli bias of the UN Human Rights Council is an affront to those who respect human rights and truth. With the murderous conduct of Libya's Moammar Gadhafi, the council has suspended Libya's membership when it should have been thrown out of the council as well as the UN General Assembly. Of course, what can one expect with a body dominated by members like China, Cuba and Saudi Arabia? Now, with the suspension of Libya, Syria, that bastion of freedom and democracy, is seeking to be a replacement. The current UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Navi Pillay, is an embarrassment. I call on Louise Arbour, the previous UN high commissioner, to speak out about the waste of time and resources of the UN Human Rights Council and to call for its abolition. Canada should refuse to contribute to the funding of the United Nations until the council is dissolved or until it is renamed the UN Special Council for Promoting Hatred Against Israel.

Israel's response to Fogel tragedy

One mourns the tragedy of the Fogel family, five of whom were murdered recently by Palestinian terrorists while they slept in their home in Itamar in the West Bank. ("Canada condemns Itamar massacre," March 17).

One should also worry about Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's response to build another several hundred homes in the West Bank. As David Remnick has written in an American magazine, the Israeli government uses any opportunity for its vision of "Greater Israel." Netanyahu's talk of peace cannot be taken seriously.

Desperate postwar Jews living in Palestine, in the Irgun, used "terrorist" tactics against the British "occupiers." Why expect Palestinians not to have their "Irgun," particularly when all actions of the Israeli government are meant to undermine the moderate factions on the Palestinian side?

Is this really the way to ensure the long-term future and prosperity of Israel?

Oops!

I always enjoy reading the Dry Bones cartoon at the top of the editorial page, but the March 24 edition about Libyan President Moammar Gadhafi and Libya's involvement with the UN Human Rights Council seems to have something amiss, aside from the oxymoron of Gadhafi and human rights. Seems to me the last two frames of the cartoon should have been the first two frames!

Gaza presents Netanyahu with tough test

Aluf Benn
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Grad missiles fired from Gaza at Be'er Sheva and Ashdod last week present Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with the toughest test of his term so far. The prime minister said he would be "strong in the face of Hamas." Now, the time has come to make good.

Until the current crisis, Netanyahu and his supporters have been able to say we have no terror. Netanyahu explained, and perhaps even believed, that the enemy is afraid of his "zero tolerance policy" against terror; that his very presence in government, with his record as an expert in the war on terror, had deterred Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Brigades from renewing their armed struggle against Israel.

But the murderers of the Fogel family in Itamar, who have yet to be apprehended, probably did not consider the identity of Israel's prime minister before they embarked on their nighttime slaughter. The launchers of the rockets and mortars are also not impressed by him. It seems that the perpetrators of last Wednesday's bombing in Jerusalem were more interested in security and escape routes than in who was sitting in the nearby Prime Minister's Office.

Netanyahu's response to the murders in Itamar, accusing the Palestinian Authority of incitement and speaking of building hundreds of apartments in settlements, was intended to calm his power base on the right and satisfy the settlers so they would not take revenge. But when it comes to Gaza, Netanyahu is doing the same thing his predecessors did.

However, the diplomatic environment is more complicated than on the eve of Operation Cast Lead in 2008-9.

U.S. President Barack Obama will not be enthusiastic over an Israeli operation that results in numerous casualties, destruction and a besieged Gaza. Egypt is in a period of political transformation and governments of Arab countries are in danger of collapse, which would make it difficult for them to support a major Israeli campaign against Hamas.

In addition the "moral" line set by the war in Libya is clear.

Attacks from the air are allowed, but no boots on the ground, and no occupation. Netanyahu will certainly try not to exceed this pattern in dealing with Gaza.

The Grad missiles that fell in Ashdod and Be'er Sheva may serve Netanyahu's efforts to stop international recognition of a Palestinian state. For they are the proof that any area Israel gives up in the West Bank merely becomes "a base for the launching of missiles against Tel Aviv and Jerusalem."

Western leaders will find this argument difficult to oppose and will have to pay at least lip service to Israel's security demands in the West Bank.

The political implications of escalation are also complex.

Terror strengthens the right and hurts the left. But the right is split now between Netanyahu and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman. Israeli hesitation in the face of continued fire from Gaza will strengthen Lieberman. An effective response against Hamas will help Netanyahu but only if it is short and surprising, the right mixture of military action and diplomacy.

Netanyahu's test will be to find this middle way.

Anarchy in Gaza: IDF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM—The Israel Air Force killed two Palestinians and wounded three more in an attack on the northern Gaza Strip on Sunday, according to Palestinian media reports.

The five Palestinians were clustered just east of the Jabalya refugee camp at the time of the attack, said the reports. The Islamic Jihad militant group claimed the casualties as its members.

A spokeswoman for the Israel Defence Forces confirmed that an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at a group of militants in the enclave but gave no further details. According to Israel Radio and witnesses, they had been trying to launch a projectile at Israel.

In public remarks to his cabinet on Sunday, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel has "no desire to escalate the situation," noting the frontier had been relatively quiet since the end of the December 2008-January 2009 Gaza war.

But he said: "We will not hesitate to use the might of the Israel Defence Forces against those who attack our citizens."

The strike came a day after Gaza groups signalled that they would halt rocket fire at Israel if the IDF stopped carrying out targeted attacks as well. The surge in cross-border violence recently has prompted fears of a possible escalation into war.

Hamas spokesman Ismail Rudwan said Saturday that militant leaders were "committed as long as the occupation [Israel] was committed" to abide by an earlier de facto truce. His comments followed a round of talks in Gaza, after of a weeklong swell in attacks.

GOC Southern Command Maj.-Gen. Tal Russo on Saturday described the situation in the Gaza Strip as "anarchic," as the IDF prepared to deploy the first of the two Iron Dome missile defence systems in the south on Monday morning.

The army has described the step as an "operational experiment," saying the deployment of the Iron Dome and beginning its actual use will take some time. The Israel Air Force stressed that even the first two batteries will not be enough, and that at least three more will be needed to provide ample defence from Gaza rocket attacks.

Three rockets were fired from the Strip into southern Israel at the end of last week. No casualties were reported in any of the incidents.

On a visit to the south, Russo said: "There's anarchy on the other side right now. It will be difficult for Hamas to roll things back. I hope they'll come to their senses."

He added that the anarchy in Gaza has spread both within Hamas and the smaller armed factions, referring to internal disagreements within Hamas on the question of renewing rocket fire on Israel or forcing other organizations to uphold the ceasefire.

Ismail Haniyeh, the head of the Hamas political wing in Gaza and the Palestinian prime minister, is pushing for a return to the relative quiet in the south, but senior officials in the Islamist organization, including some in the armed wing, disagree.

It seems Hamas is also finding it difficult to enforce its authority upon smaller factions, with small groups now carrying out their own policies. The fact many more Grad rockets were smuggled into Gaza in recent weeks and distributed between the factions also makes the situation more difficult to control.

The deterrence achieved after Operation Cast Lead two years ago is eroding, Russo said Saturday. Both the government and the IDF believe it will be difficult to retain any calm for long and that another escalation may occur in the near future.

In related developments, U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates last Friday made the first trip by a U.S. defence chief to the West Bank city of Ramallah, meeting with Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and continuing to push for peace despite the recent spate of rocket and mortar attacks.

Gates, who also met with Netanyahu on Friday, visited Fayyad in Ramallah to speak about a return to peace negotiations with Israel.

Gates said he looked forward to talking about progress toward a two-state solution. Fayyad said this is a time of great challenges throughout the region, and he was looking forward to a redoubling of the peace effort.

Direct peace talks that began in Washington in September 2010 froze within weeks.

Fayyad's party, Fatah, which is led by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, is a rival of Hamas and controls the West Bank. Hamas has ruled Gaza since seizing power in a five-day civil war against Fatah in 2007. As a wave of pro-democracy unrest reverberates through the region, both sides have faced growing calls to reconcile.

Israel should end the occupation of the West Bank by September, Fayyad told Gates.

Fayyad stressed to Gates the importance of meeting the September deadline set in what he called the "Ending the Occupation, Establishing the State" program, in a statement issued by PA Prime Minister's Office said.

According to this two-year program, the Palestinians would have completed building their state institutions and enforced security on the ground by the end of August 2011, to allow them to establish their independent state.

Only talking can end the hostility

I was driving my son and a friend to school on Friday, March 11, when we heard news of a massive earthquake hitting northern Japan. I came home and was glued to the horrific images of the tsunami engulfing prefecture after prefecture.

Thousands of lives taken and colossal devastation in what is probably the best-prepared nation on earth for such calamities, rapidly followed by a threat of nuclear disaster. I am awed and envious of Japanese stoicism in the face of this gargantuan misfortune.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Israelis felt great sympathy for Japan and its people. We offered search-and-rescue teams. The Japanese declined.

And there was renewed discussion about what will happen when a major earthquake hits our region. Experts say it's only a matter of time. The Syrian-African fault runs along the Jordan Valley and has caused major quakes in the past. In 1837, thousands were killed and much of Safed and Tiberias were destroyed. In the 1927 6.2 quake, centred in the Dead Sea, hundreds died in Jerusalem, Jericho and their environs and much property was damaged.

Improvements have been made to building codes. We have a Ministry of National Infrastructures that deals with "earthquake preparedness," and at school, our kids practise what to do when tremors hit. The general belief is, however, that we won't fare well when the next major quake comes. Questions are now also being asked about safety at Israel's nuclear plants, including one only 20 kilometres or so from the fault line.

Other sorts of tremors are already being felt in our region.

Later that same Friday, 70 kilometres north of Jerusalem, in the West Bank settlement of Itamar, Udi and Ruth Fogel and five of their six children retired to bed after Shabbat dinner. When their sixth child, 12-year-old Tamar, returned home after midnight, she was alarmed to find her house uncommonly locked and muddy footsteps around its perimeter. Upon entering it with a neighbour, they discovered a terrible, grisly sight.

Tamar's parents and three of her siblings, including three-month-old Hadas, had been butchered in their sleep by a terrorist, or terrorists, who'd entered the settlement and successfully fled, presumably to one of the neighbouring Palestinian towns or villages.

In Israel, outrage was almost universal. Both Jews and Arabs were shocked by the Fogels' monstrous slaughter, finding any motive incomprehensible. The sight of five stretchers at their joint funeral was unbearable.

The rest of the world seemed less appalled, focused mainly on the Japanese catastrophe. But one foreign account I read seemed to concentrate more on the "illegality" of Itamar than on the gruesome murders.

A fierce response to this terrible attack was anticipated. After other such acts, and even following authorities' dismantling or destruction of unauthorized Israeli building, extremist settlers have responded with what they call "price tags" – violent acts of "revenge" vented against usually uninvolved Palestinians and their property: olive trees are burned or destroyed, and stones thrown through the windows of neighbouring homes.

With this potential backdrop, the Israel Defence Forces and police wisely sent reinforcements to hot spots in Samaria and Judea. Widespread damage to Palestinian property has been averted, although there have been some violent attacks against innocent Palestinians, including one stabbing.

Horrific terrorist attacks like the Itamar massacre backfire. Whether one agrees with them or not, the people of these settlements, especially those in the very heart of the West Bank, are religiously and ideologically motivated. The Fogels' neighbours will only become more steadfast and new settlers will move in. Terrorism won't uproot them.

Extremist settlers' acts of vengeance also serve no purpose, save letting off steam. They may intimidate some Palestinians, but in reality they only encourage more radical bellicosity against Israel, the IDF and the settlers. Moreover, any sympathy and support that settlers and their cause garner in the wake of terror attacks quickly dissipates when they take the law into their own hands.

Both Palestinians and Israelis must realize that violence won't end hostilities between them. Only talking will.

Perhaps they both need a dose of Japanese stoicism to grasp this.

And we haven't yet begun to talk of other major tremors shaking this region, in Tunisia, Egypt, Yemen, Libya, Bahrain and Syria. It's too early to discern what all of this means for Israel. That'll have to wait for a future column. Maybe by then, some of the dust will have settled.

Libya, Egypt and the restoration of human rights

While it's too early to predict how the uprisings against the corrupt Arab dictatorships will end, the millions of Arab and Islamic voices calling for human rights and democracy are finally being heard. From Tunisia and Libya to Egypt, Syria, and Yemen, citizens who have been silenced and threatened into submission for decades are demanding freedom.

These mass demonstrations and protests stand out in stark contrast to years of almost total silence on the part of the international "human rights community" regarding the chronic abuses in the Middle East. While the world's highest concentration of regimes that abuse human rights is located in this region, the various international "watchdog" groups have shown very little interest in exposing these crimes.

The United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) has been dominated by Libya, Iran, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and their allies, thereby preventing any serious discussion or action to help their own citizens. In parallel, groups such as Amnesty International, as well as Canadian groups claiming to promote human rights produce occasional, mildly worded rebukes, but have avoided serious confrontation or sustained campaigns.

Instead, most of these groups have immorally targeted Israel. Human Rights Watch (HRW), which has a Toronto branch, even lauded the Gadhafi family as "reformers," and went to Saudi Arabia, not to protest the lack of freedom there for women or minorities, but to raise money to promote the infamous Goldstone report, immorally and falsely seeking to label Israel as a nation of "war criminals."

The recent uprisings throughout the Arab world, in addition to demanding changes on the ground, exposed the bankruptcy of the international human rights establishment. The demonstrations in Libya, Egypt, Yemen and elsewhere are front page news, and these groups have been forced to respond.

In place of their obsession with Israel, they're now actually examining the daily abuses in these closed societies. During the protests in Egypt, researchers and activists working for Amnesty and HRW, along with a number of journalists, were harassed and arrested by government officials.

For this important development to go beyond a temporary response and lead to a major and sustained shift in the agendas of these organizations, important structural changes are necessary.

Powerful NGOs such as Amnesty International must move quickly to remove ideologues and charlatans, who, among other anti-human rights activities, have campaigned on behalf of an admitted Hezbollah spy and expelled human rights advocates who questioned Amnesty's affiliation with alleged Taliban supporters.

Similarly, the ideological heads of HRW's Middle East and North Africa division, who are partisan anti-Israeli ideologues, need to be replaced by moral advocates of universal human rights.

Last year, HRW founder Robert Bernstein broke with his own organization, which had abandoned the critical moral distinction between democratic societies and closed societies. In reference to the Arab and Iranian regimes, Bernstein notes, "The plight of their citizens who would most benefit from the kind of attention a large and well-financed international human rights organization can provide is being ignored as Human Rights Watch's Middle East division prepares report after report on Israel."

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Instead of heeding Bernstein's well-founded criticism, HRW's cynical power brokers sought to discredit their founder, heaping abuse on someone who has done far more to promote human rights than any of them. As a result, the biased agenda that largely ignored, and in some cases provided support to, Gadhafi and other Arab tyrants continued.

At the United Nations, the UNHRC is unlikely to change in any sustained and meaningful sense as long as the Islamic bloc and other anti-democratic regimes control its agenda. This coalition cannot be expected to voluntarily leave the council or accept the changes necessary to restore the principles of universal human rights.

As a result, the world's democracies need to divorce themselves from the hijacked activities and allegations emanating from the UNHRC and clearly expose this farce by refusing to take part in any more sessions. Independent of the UN, democratic governments must hold repressive regimes accountable, not withstanding their oil production.

These steps would help at least begin the long-overdue process of restoring the frameworks meant to protect universal human rights.

Homegrown Muslim terrorism sparks U.S. debate

Peter King ignited an acrimonious national debate in the United States earlier this month when, as chair of the homeland security committee in the House of Representatives, he launched hearings on homegrown Islamic terrorism. King, a Republican congressman from New York, claims that Al Qaeda is trying to radicalize and recruit American Muslims and that this effort represents a threat to the United States. He further charges that 85 per cent of American imams hold radical views and that Muslim community leaders have failed to co-operate with the U.S. government in the campaign to disrupt terrorist plots.

To no one's surprise, the hearings have provoked an uproar.

Fifty-one Muslim, civil rights and interfaith groups have accused King of conducting a witch hunt and resurrecting the spectre of McCarthyism.

Reflecting this view, Rabbi Marc Schneier, the president of the Foundation for Ethnic Understanding, said: "To single out Muslim Americans as the source of homegrown terrorism and not examine all forms of violence motivated by extremist belief... is an injustice."

King's supporters argue that Al Qaeda has targeted only American Muslims and that King is neither paranoid nor racist, given the undeniable involvement of American Muslims in jihadist terrorist incidents since Sept. 11, 2001, when 19 foreign Arab terrorists attacked the United States with horrific results.

John Walker Lindh

The hearings come at a sensitive moment. Some 150,000 U.S. troops are bogged down in protracted and generally unpopular wars/insurrections in two Muslim countries, Iraq and Afghanistan. U.S. aircraft are bombing Libya. Anti-American feelings are running high in the Muslim world, due to Washington's support of Israel, conservative Arab regimes such as Saudi Arabia and Bahrain and the ostensibly secular government in Pakistan. Amid all this, suspicion of and animosity toward American Muslims is on the rise in the United States.

Fierce opposition to the construction of a Muslim cultural centre and mosque near the site of the World Trade Center, destroyed by Arab terrorists a decade ago come September, has brought to the surface a wave of anti-Muslim sentiments.

Sheldon Kirshner

in Toronto

A Pew survey released two days before King's hearings got underway revealed that Americans are conflicted over the relationship between Islam and violence. Forty per cent of the respondents said they believe that Islam is more likely to encourage violence than other religions. Forty two per cent disagree with that notion, which is fed, in part, by bloggers, pamphleteers and public speakers such as Pamela Geller, Robert Spencer, Walid Shoebat and Brigitte Gabriel.

Aligned with evangelical Christians and right-wing Zionists, they claim that extremism is synonymous with Islam and that Muslims, driven by "Islamofascism", are pursuing a secret and subversive agenda to revise the U.S. constitution and impose Islamic law on the United States.

Under the impact of their theories and the arrest of American Muslims charged with terrorism, tensions have flared, prompting Americans of the Muslim faith to compare themselves to American citizens previously victimized and marginalized by ethnocentrism and racism: African-Americans throughout the ages, Irish Roman Catholics in the 19th century, Jews in the first half of the 20th century and ethnic Japanese after Japan's bombing of Pearl Harbor.

Fostered by this climate of intolerance, a series of unpleasant incidents, plainly at odds with the tenets of American democracy, have occurred of late.

In towns such as Murfreesboro, Tenn., Temecula, Calif., and Sheboygan, Wis., Republican party candidates, Tea Party activists and Christian ministers have criticized plans to build new mosques.

Elsewhere, a flurry of anti-Muslim violence has broken out. In Madera, Calif., a plastic pig was thrown into a mosque. In a mosque in upstate New York, some teenagers were caught firing guns during Ramadan prayers. And in New York City last August, a 21-year-old student, Michael Enright, assaulted a taxi driver with a knife when he learned he was a Muslim.

Against the backdrop of such violence, a record number of Muslim Americans have filed complaints of employment discrimination, claiming that co-workers regularly taunt them and that employers prevent them from wearing head scarves or taking prayer breaks.

It is supremely ironic that these incidents are taking place at a time when Barack Obama is the president of the United States. The first African-American president and a person falsely described as a Muslim by some of his critics, Obama is committed to building bridges between the United States and the Muslim world.

In a speech in Cairo shortly after his election, he called for a "new beginning" in relations with the world's Muslims.

On the ninth anniversary of 9/11, he declared, "We are not and never will be at war with Islam."

In accordance with this philosophy, Obama's national security adviser, Denis McDonough, visited a mosque in Sterling, Va., on the eve of King's hearings to assure American Muslims that they would not be stigmatized or demonized "because of the actions of a few."

From 9/11 to the end of 2009, the U.S. government reported that about 125 American Muslims, whether Muslim-born or converts to Islam, were involved in 46 incidents of terrorism. Some American Muslims are drawn to radicalism and terrorism because of disgust with U.S. foreign policy and acceptance of Islamic fundamentalist ideas.

But as dangerous and disconcerting as it is today, homegrown Islamic terrorism in the United States is a marginal phenomenon. The vast majority of America's estimated 2.6 million Muslims are law-abiding citizens or immigrants.

And it should be noted that American Muslims have turned in 48 of the 125 Muslims suspected of having plotted terrorism.

By the same token, it would be naive and foolhardy to deny that most, if not all, of the high-profile cases of domestic terrorism that have resulted in convictions have been committed by Muslims or converts to Islam.

From John Walker Lindh, Jose Padilla and David Headley to Nidal Hasan, Anwar al-Awlaki and Faisal Shahzad, the American Muslim community has produced an alarming list of homicidal Islamic fundamentalist malcontents who have not only wreaked havoc and death but betrayed their country.

Lindh, a convert, joined the Taliban and was captured as an enemy combatant in Afghanistan. Padilla, a convert as well, participated in an Al Qaeda plot to detonate a "dirty bomb" on U.S. soil. Headley, of partial Pakistani ancestry, identified targets for Lashkar-e-Taiba, which perpetrated India's 9/11 in Mumbai. Hasan, an army officer of Palestinian origin, shot and killed 13 people on a military base. Awlaki, a cleric of Yemenite extraction, was an Al Qaeda recruiter. Shahzad, a naturalized citizen from Pakistan, tried to detonate a car bomb in Manhattan's Times Square.

Nidal Hasan

These terrorists are a disgrace to the Muslim community, but American Muslims cannot gratuitously be tarred with their brush.

I feel fortunate to follow in my father's footsteps.

My father grew up in a world of uncertainty and volatility. He came to Canada, worked hard to build a successful business and a stable life for his family. Part of that stability is the Romspen Mortgage Fund which has delivered a reliable fixed income to both of us each and every month. It's important that my father has an investment he trusts. Knowing that he doesn't have to worry is very comforting to me.

Israeli novelist tackles big issues

Sheldon Kirshner
Staff Reporter

A.B. Yehoshua, one of Israel's towering literary figures, was in Toronto last week on a whirlwind visit, blaming both sides for not resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict, reiterating his view that Jews can lead a full Jewish life only in Israel and talking about his forthcoming book.

A.B. Yehoshua

A novelist, essayist, playwright and professor of Hebrew literature at Haifa University, he was here to deliver the Pearl and Jack Mandel Lecture in Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.

A few hours before stepping up to the podium to deliver his speech, From Mythology to History, Yehoshua sat on a couch deep within the Gothic bowels of University College, fielding questions from journalists on a wide range of topics .

A rumpled, approachable figure in black with a shock of somewhat unruly white hair who arrived in the city after it was slammed by a spring snowstorm, the 74-year-old writer is widely known for his considerable body of work, his role as an outspoken peace activist and his keen support for a two-state solution.

A Sabra of Sephardi origin who served his country as a paratrooper in the Israeli army in the 1950s, Yehoshua said that Israelis, suffering from fatigue and having lost hope in defusing the Arab-Israeli dispute, have retreated into their own private lives.

Suggesting that this theme is echoed in his last published novel, Friendly Fire: A Duet, he described the conflict as the world's longest running one and so intractable that even the big powers have failed to resolve it.

Claiming "the guilt" lies "on two sides," he said that neither Israel nor the Palestinians are really prepared to solve it.

It took the Palestinians far too long to recognize the necessity of political compromise, he said in an allusion to the now-defunct Oslo peace process.

But even now, he noted, they still seek a solution based on the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in Israel. This scenario will "never be accepted" by the overwhelming majority of Jewish Israelis, he said emphatically.

A critic of Israel's military occupation of the territories, Yehoshua warned that Israeli settlements in the West Bank are "destroying" the prospect of peace and are nothing less than "a disaster" for Israel.

Accusing Israel of seizing territory in the West Bank that should be part of a future Palestinian state, he said that Israel's policy saps Palestinian confidence in the possibility of an eventual peace agreement.

Correspondingly, the second intifadah, which broke out in the autumn of 2000, shook Israel's trust in the Palestinians' desire for "real peace."

He expressed support for the unofficial 2003 Geneva Accord, which has been touted by some Israelis and Palestinians as a model of an Israeli-Palestinian peace agreement.

Under its terms, Israel would withdraw almost to the pre-1967 lines, enabling the Palestinians to form a demilitarized state with eastern Jerusalem as its capital. Israel would keep a limited number of settlements, exchange territory with the Palestinians on the basis of a 1-1 land swap and solve the Palestinian refugee problem through compensation and resettlement in a Palestinian state.

Once an agreement is signed, Yehoshua said, Jewish settlers in the West Bank should be permitted to stay on as Palestinian citizens. "There are settlers ready to do it," he said, adding that the Palestinian Authority would accept a Jewish minority of two to three per cent in its sovereign state.

Yehoshua said he's not certain whether Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is sincere about his conversion to a two-state solution. But he voiced certainty that Netanyahu can achieve peace with the Palestinian Authority if the Kadima and Labor parties join his coalition government.

He said he doesn't understand why Netanyahu insists on explicit Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state. "We didn't ask France or Canada to recognize Israel as a Jewish state."

Without wishing to be offensive, Yehoshua claimed that only Israeli Jews, coping daily with existential issues of war and peace, can lead full and total Jewish lives. By comparison, Jews in the Diaspora participate in their respective countries as, say, Canadians or Americans.

Yehoshua said his next novel, Spanish Charity, turns on a Jewish film director and examines the forces of creativity. The English edition, titled The Picture, will be out in print in about a year, he said.

Yehoshua's trip was sponsored by the Tikvah Fund, the Shier Family Fund, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, the Charles F. Bronfman Chair in Israeli Studies, the Samuel Zachs Chair in Jewish History, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies and the Israeli consulate.

Music teacher has 'magic guitar'

By Frances Kraft

It's hard to imagine that Bryna Bruder-Wechsler was, as she puts it, devastatingly shy as a youngster growing up in Montreal.

Elliott Michaelson – who used to work at Beth Torah Congregation, where Bruder-Wechsler has taught music for the past three years, and is now at Congregation Darchei Noam – says she has "exactly the kind of personality that supplementary schools need" in order to capture kids' attention, given that their time at school is limited.

But the music teacher at Beth Torah's supplementary school – which is called Hebrew's Cool – said that when she was a small child, she used to hide behind a wall, or behind her mother, a former violinist in the Montreal Women's Symphony Orchestra, to sing for guests.

At age 10, she began performing with the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre group and started what would become a career in Jewish music education.

Now a mother of three boys – ages 6, 8 and 9 – Bruder-Wechsler, 44, has a B.Ed. from McGill University and can be found at Beth Torah twice a week.

As well, she teaches at Netivot HaTorah Day School's south branch, leads the choir at Leo Baeck Day School's south branch (she has been with the school for 20 years, ever since she began teaching there shortly after her arrival in Toronto), and is a facilitator of two tot music and art programs.

A lesson from the teacher: "It's important to keep Jewish kids knowing they're Jewish, and to try to do that through song. They will feel their Judaism through meaningful song."

As the daughter of a Holocaust survivor father, Bruder-Wechsler, who attended United Talmud Torahs through Grade 6, said she has a fondness and appreciation for "not only Yiddish, but being Jewish.

"It's my legacy to keep connecting the kids to who they are. You can really do it through song, if you feel it – and through the right songs. You can promote conversation and good dialogue, and just connectedness."

"Coming from a survivor family, I feel that [kids] knowing who they are is of utmost importance, and that's what gives me the energy to do what I do with such passion."

Michaelson said that Bruder-Wechsler connects with students in a whimsical way as she "waves her magic guitar."

She engages students with songs that are accompanied by enthusiastic motions – tapping knees and shoulders, and snapping fingers faster and faster – and with "quiet, sit-down-on-the-carpet" Hebrew songs, too, discussing the words so that students will understand them.

A highlight of Bruder-Wechsler's teaching career was having 100 of her students sing, among other selections, "a funky Siman Tov u'Mazel Tov" at her wedding in 1999.

"I wanted them to experience a Jewish wedding," she said. "They were amazing... It was the best wedding ever."

New community voice joins pro-Israel left

Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf
Staff Reporter

A new Canadian Jewish community position has been added to the ever-growing cacophony of voices arguing the merits and faults of Israeli policy.

JSpaceCanada.ca is a new website devoted to gathering and disseminating pro-Israel voices from the soft-left, or "progressive" end of the political spectrum, while countering the global assault on Israel's legitimacy. It was launched earlier this year.

Issie Lyon, a retired Ontario civil servant, and Nora Gold, co-founder of the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIFC), are among the project's creators.

"For too long the pro-Israel pro-peace community has been marginalized by extremists from both sides, and as lovers of Israel, we have a duty to create a new space on the spectrum where rational voices can be heard," Gold wrote in an e-mail.

Nora Gold

She added: "I started this organization out of the conviction that only the pro-Israel left can influence the anti-Israel left. No one else – for instance right-wing Jews, or even mainstream Jews – can do this, because they don't have any common language with the people who need to be influenced."

Speaking to The CJN last week, Lyon said JSpaceCanada has also jumped headlong into the social networking realm, with a page on Facebook to "reach out to the greater community."

"We're a small group right now [and] we're a virtual community... but we're getting good feedback," he said.

While focusing primarily on "progressive" positions on Israel, Lyon said, his group is interested in speaking with all stakeholders interested in the long-term stability and existence of Israel.

He said JSpaceCanda is just beginning the discussion with those in the greater Jewish community whose political views fall "somewhere between the hard-right and the hard-left."

For instance, he said one of his organization's projects will be to approach Jewish union members across Canada who may be tempted to dabble in the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement simply because they may not have any other community channel to voice their displeasure at Israeli policies they don't like.

"We want to go to those Jews and tell them this is counter-productive," Lyon said. "We'll be sponsoring events to stimulate this discussion" in the future.

Lyon estimated that at this time there are only "a couple of dozen people" who would be considered members of JSpaceCanada, but that the word has spread.

He added that the JSpaceCanada project will likely be driven as an "Internet community" where most of the dialogue will occur online.

The JSpaceCanada site describes itself as offering a "balanced perspective" on Israel.

"We ardently oppose Israel's Jewish settlements on the West Bank, which we believe undermine the chances of peace in the region. Equally ardently, we oppose all initiatives that attempt to challenge the legitimacy of Israel, impose boycotts, divestments or sanctions (BDS) on Israel, or negate Israel's intrinsic right to exist," the site states.

Athlete's bar mitzvah funds go to Maccabi Canada

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

Following in his older sister's footsteps, Oliver Strasser has asked his friends and family to donate to a charitable cause for his upcoming bar mitzvah.

Strasser, who celebrates his milestone on April 2, is an athlete who wants to combine his passion with his mitzvah.

"He wanted to be a catalyst to give others less fortunate than he is an opportunity to participate in the most elite Jewish sporting accomplishment that exists – the Maccabiah in Israel," said Stuart Lewis, executive director of Maccabi Canada.

"It turns out that we have a donation program ideally suited to his exalted goal – the Maccabi Canada Adopt-an-Athlete program. Oliver was thrilled. He ultimately did select Maccabi Canada for this bar mitzvah project and we are honoured."

The Adopt-an-Athlete program helps qualified Canadian Jewish athletes attend the next Maccabiah Games in Israel when they do not have the financial means.

"I think that every child should have an opportunity to play if they want to, but I know that some athletes can't afford to pay for training. I heard about Maccabi, and I like what they do," Oliver said.

"I just thought it was a good mix of things that mean something to me, and that if I could help other Jewish athletes too, it would be a good idea."

Not only do these athletes get to compete with the best Jewish athletes in the world, but for many of them it will be their first opportunity to see and experience Israel, he said.

With its Adopt-an-Athlete program and other new initiatives, Maccabi Canada has transformed from "a quadrennial event-based organization into more of a movement embedded in the community," Lewis said.

Maccabi Canada now strives to promote Jewish identity and cultivate future leadership through the passion of sport on a more regular basis. "It is not a once-every-four-year phenomenon. It is something we try to achieve each and every day," he said.

"We have a unique hook to Israel that no other organization does. We have the ability to connect people to Israel solely because they happen to love sports and are good at sports. But what is new about this is we are now embarking on a much stronger programmatic component to our Maccabiah event in Israel."

Lewis said Maccabi Canada is creating an Israel educational experience prior to the Maccabiah games. "This was a key piece missing from previous Maccabiah games for the Canadian team. This is an invaluable component of the overall experience that we must provide to our athletes going forward."

Oliver Strasser, who celebrates his bar mitzvah on April 2, plays for the North York Rangers hockey team.

In addition, Maccabi Canada has developed an outreach committee chaired by board member Dalia Raphael that strives to make an impact in the Jewish community.

Recently, Karen James, a former Maccabiah athlete and Canadian swimmer in the 1972 Munich Olympics, spoke before grades 7 and 8 students at Associated Hebrew Schools and the Robbins Hebrew Academy.

"She spoke of her Jewish pride and connection to the Jewish community being triggered by the tragic events of the 1972 Munich Olympics. Karen shared with these students some very personal aspects of what she witnessed during those dark days in Munich," Lewis said.

Maccabi Canada is also discussing a possible partnership with Jewish summer camps for athletic programs this summer.

Jewish law adapts to new situations, says rabbi

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl told The CJN at the time that the community "should not misunderstand the justifiable inclusion of women for Torah honours with the abandonment of rabbinic law or gender distinctiveness."

However, he said last week, Jewish law changes and adapts to new situations. The new policy is "not an abandonment of Jewish law, rather it's an affirmation of it."

The issue of counting women in a minyan is "much more complex halachically" than the Torah honours he wrote about 17 years ago, the rabbi added.

At the time, he said, he didn't find all of the arguments he had read in favour of counting women in the minyan "sufficiently cogent." But in the past three years, he's read other sources "that I believed had significant halachic cogency."

Among them, he said, were writings by Conservative halachic authority Rabbi David Golinkin and Orthodox Rabbi Michael Chernick. Arguments by Rabbi Chernick, which are not cited in the tshuvah, were not related to public prayer per se, but rather to the potential for women's holiness.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's tshuvah explains that women have a personal responsibility for daily prayer, despite the mishnaic exemption from time-dependent mitzvot.

As well, he notes that "the dignity of the congregation" – often cited as a reason for limitations on women's participation – is a "fluid concept, reflecting cultural context."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said he was surprised to receive e-mails from people all over Canada in response to the tshuvah. "I would say by and large women have written me to tell me that the idea of personal dignity resonates for them... I haven't received any significant negative reaction."

He plans to provide study opportunities for the congregation on this issue after he returns from his sabbatical in May.

Kahn said there has not been a need for women to be counted in the minyan, from a numbers standpoint. For at least the past year, he said, there hasn't been a shortage of men to be counted toward a minyan.

He said the reaction from the congregation has been "overwhelmingly positive," although he knew of one person who didn't agree with the tshuvah.

Kahn said the new policy refers only to women counting in the minyan. "We're not expanding the role of women as prayer leaders or changing the fact they can't have the first two aliyot."

Toward the end of the 29-page tshuvah, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl wrote, "In our time, when many social barriers have shifted and women are involved in all areas of public life, their personal dignity (kavod habriyot) is impinged upon when they are marginalized within the spiritual life of their religious community... In a time when women are socially, politically and culturally integrated with and equal to men, an unjustified gap between genders in synagogue life can bring about a denigration of Torah and a desecration of the Divine name."

Teens to participate in day of service

Compiled by CJN Staff

More than 500 Toronto-area teens, along with 10,000 Jewish teens from across North America, Europe and Israel, will participate in a day of community service next month.

Volunteers for J-Serve Toronto: the Global Day of Jewish Youth Service will meet at Adath Israel Congregation at 11:30 a.m. on April 10. At 12:30 p.m., they will depart to service sites, with transportation provided by chartered buses, and at 4:30 p.m., they return to Adath Israel for a wrap-up.

This year marks the second year in which Toronto-area teens will participate in the international initiative, thanks to funding by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the PANIM Institute of BBYO.

"Teens are directed to register at Jserve.ca, where they will be asked to choose a project from among several service opportunities," said Kevin Goodman, program director at BBYO.

J-Serve Toronto's service options include cleaning for Passover at Ansei Minsk Synagogue; visiting with patients at Baycrest; taking part in youth-led environmental workshops hosted by Bayview Corridor Synagogues; selling pins for the Canadian Cancer Society's annual Daffodil Month; assisting residents of Habayit Shelanu with gardening through Circle of Care; spearheading a transformative cleanup of Earl Bales Park; hosting a party for residents at long-term care home Cummer Lodge; joining DANI (which helps young adults with physical and/or cognitive challenges) participants for fun and treats; taking part in a series of workshops with Free the Children; canvassing to promote UJA Federation's annual Walk with Israel; assembling education kits with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, to be sent to Israeli families in need, and working the phones at the Zareinu Educational Centre telethon to promote its 14th annual Moveathon.

J-Serve Toronto coincides with the kickoff of Volunteer Canada's National Volunteer Week, our country's largest celebration of volunteers, volunteerism and civic participation.

For more information about J-Serve Toronto, visit www.jserve.ca or contact Kerry Bernknopf, project co-ordinator, at 416-398-2004, ext. 223, or kbernknopf@bbyo.ca.

Celebrating Passover at Reena.

As we gear up to celebrate the beautiful holiday of Passover, commemorating the exodus of the Jewish nation from Egypt to Israel, we immerse ourselves in plans and preparations. To assist our group homes in this tremendous effort, Reena publishes a Practical Passover Planner every year, guiding staff and the people with developmental disabilities that they support to successfully schedule and complete all of the many tasks involved in an organized and unhurried manner. Each Reena home enjoys a "Kosher for Passover" cookbook put together by the Faith & Culture Department. In order to enjoy and experience the seder, the festive meal re-enacting the exodus, each Reena group home has a number of Reena Passover Haggadahs especially prepared for their use.

Some people with developmental disabilities involved in Reena will be going to their family home for the seders. For those individuals not going home, many group homes will be holding their own seder.

If you have not yet completed your plans for Pesach seders and want to perform an important mitzvah, please consider leading a seder at a Reena group home or invite a person(s) with a developmental disability to be a guest at your family seder on either Monday night, April 18th or Tuesday night, April 19th.

Purim's message

Rabbi David Cadoch

We recently completed a wonderful Purim celebration amidst the sad events in Itamar, Israel. This makes me wonder how it is possible to celebrate when our brothers and sisters are in mourning for a senseless tragedy – the murder of five members of a family as they slept.

So what else is new in our nation's destiny? In every generation, we are the focus of the biblical Amalek's plot for destruction, in ways not always as evident as in previous generations. Ours is the plot of institutions of higher learning and the world of multimedia gone awry.

Purim celebrates the unique and complete acceptance of the Torah by the Jewish nation at a time of dangerous persecution. We are told in the Megillah that Haman was a descendant of Amalek and desired the annihilation of the Jews of India and Persia, where the events of Purim take place.

The reason given for Haman's hatred was that Mordechai refused to bow down in reverence. A question comes to mind: why did Mordechai choose that moment to place the Jews of Shushan in a terrible predicament? Showing reverence to a king or government officials is certainly permitted for the sake of peaceful relations. It was not out of the ordinary for citizens of a nation to show respect with a bow. Even Abraham, we are told in Genesis, bowed down to the children of Heth when he was dealing to acquire the cave of Machpelah to bury his wife, Sarah.

As can be seen from this, bowing could be the custom of the land to show reverence. So why would Mordechai refuse? The Megillah tells us that he openly confided to the king's servants that he was a Jew and this information was related to Haman. Now, Haman had a motive for attacking the Jews of Shushan.

Rabbinic Reflections

The Megillah tells us how Haman sought the king's permission to destroy the Jews. The Megillah relates: "And Haman said to the king, 'There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of your kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all the people; neither keep they the king's laws. Therefore, it is not for the king's profit to suffer them.'"

There is no mention of Mordechai's not bowing down. Rather, he says that the Jews have different laws than the rest of the citizens, and therefore, they should not be tolerated, as they have no value for the king.

Is this not the constant accusation of centuries and the reason for persecution? What has changed in the 21st century, despite the Jewish nation's tremendous contributions to science, medicine and computer technology?

Our survival remains in our unity, and this is what Purim tells us. Once the people of Shushan realized their predicament, they took upon themselves the acceptance of the Torah and stood united, despite all odds. The day destined for destruction became a day of celebration for unity and freedom.

The need for optimism

It's extremely difficult to be optimistic or sanguine about the state of the world today. The future is fraught with infinite dangers and perils for humanity. No sane or realistic person can put on rose-coloured glasses or be unconcerned about tomorrow.

But to become restless and impatient, to fall victim to frustration and pessimism, to become fatalistic or despondent – these are the surest ways to bring our direst predictions upon us.

What is necessary is a sense of historical perspective. Surveying the career of Napoleon, his meteoric rise and fall, Victor Hugo wrote, "God eventually got bored with him". Hitler's Third Reich was to last 1,000 years – it endured for less than half a generation.

An ancient king had the motto "This too shall pass" emblazed upon his banner. It was his way of indicating that no matter how numerous the difficulties and tribulations, no matter how complex and dangerous the trials and threats to our lives at the moment – in the fullness of time, in the rich harvest of the years, all of this would pass and be forgotten.

The truth of the matter is that few of us, no matter how pessimistic we sound, are totally bereft of hope. A man in Montreal, in order to make a point, had some small cards printed with the words, "I have reached the limits of my hope and capacity." At the bottom of the neat card was a blank line for a signature. Whenever he encountered someone who was filled with pessimistic talk or who displayed lack of hope, he would hand him/her the card and ask for his/her signature. After 18 months and many encounters there were few who, when put to the test, were prepared to sign away either hope or resourcefulness.

Bernard Baskin

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, in his recent book Future Tense, writes, "To have come through the Holocaust and still believe in life, to live through what Israel has lived through and still strive for peace, to have experienced the degree of hate poured out against them by some of Europe's greatest minds and remain undefiled: that is a people of which I am proud to be a part."

We must constantly seek hope and faith in the morrow that will be better. Judaism agrees with the saying, "There are no hopeless situations. Only men grow hopeless about them."

Also, it has been aptly said, "When a person loses a friend, he loses much. When he loses health, he loses more. But when he loses courage, he loses all."

Rabbi Sacks declares that to be a Jew is to be an agent of hope. He maintains that every ritual, every command, every syllable of the Jewish story is a protest against escapism, resignation and the blind acceptance of a fate.

We must agree with him that despite an often bleak and baleful environment, injustice and brutality are not the final word about the human condition. Unyielding faith can be more powerful than empires. Ideals are not illusions to give us comfort, but candles to light our way along a winding road in the dark night so that we don't give way to fear or lose a sense of direction.

'Israeli Apartheid' Week tests new low

By all accounts, and in accordance with the norms of morality that usually define human behaviour in most cultures, the murder of defenceless innocents speaks to an anomalous and monstrous depravity. It's abhorrent enough when the victims of such slaughter are adults, but it's all the more pathological when children, or even babies, become the targets.

Such evil, in all of its horror, unfolded when the Fogel family – parents, two young children, and a three-month-old baby – were methodically and mercilessly slaughtered in their home in the settlement of Itamar on March 11.

The media, understandably preoccupied with the tsunami in Japan and the unrest in Libya, were slow to report the killings. When they began to do so, many outlets, in their predictable zeal to attribute motive and provide "context," began padding their stories with nuance and factual inversion, rather than unreservedly condemning the manifest brutality for what it really was.

To in any way try to rationalize savagery of this magnitude serves no less than to diminish it, and to excuse its excesses. We had an inkling of this at McMaster University on March 17 when Lia Tarachansky, Middle East correspondent for the Real News – an independent video network that has bureaus in Toronto and Washington D.C. – was invited to discuss media coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict at one of McMaster's "Israeli apartheid" week (IAW) events. In addressing her topic, she tended to selectively zone in on aspects of the narrative that best supported a particular perspective, which had the net effect of depicting Israelis as oppressors and occupiers.

My View

Lawrence Hart

And though she could very well have avoided reference to the murders in Itamar altogether, she chose instead not only to focus on them but to use the tragedy as an example of how media coverage in the territories is biased, usually portraying Israelis as the sole victims and thereby failing to address the contextual framework in which anti-settler violence might occur.

When asked what possible rationalization there could be for what happened to the Fogel family, she seemed to imply that the very presence of Israeli settlers was provocation enough, and she then proceeded to explain that the murders might be seen as revenge for the death of a Palestinian youth who was shot by Israeli hikers in the West Bank in January – after the 17-year-old had attacked the hikers with rocks. Another provocation, in her opinion, was the campaign by Israel's education minister, Gideon Sa'ar, to begin sending Israeli school children on trips to the Tomb of the Patriots in Hebron.

On the one hand, Tarachansky's analysis came across as speculative and simplistic. On the other hand, it demonstrated an unseemly undertone that all too often permeates the discourse on the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

Disingenuousness is the very lifeblood of IAW, so when columnist, Lorne Gunter asks "will IAW organizers discuss the Itamar massacre?" (National Post, March 18), the answer, if the McMaster experience is anything to go by, is, "Yes they will." Regrettably, their discussion is not what Gunter, or any other reasonable, compassionate person might have expected. Or maybe it is.

Charoset: the mortar the merrier

Last week we looked at the rich history of charoset – or charoses – the mixture of nuts, wine and apple that is reminiscent of the bricks and mortar the Israelites slaved over in Egypt. Today, we sample the multitude of recipes for what would seem to be such a simple food.

Maimonides is best known as a philosopher, a codifier of Jewish law and a doctor. But you can also try the sage's 1,000-year-old recipe for charoset: "Dates, dried figs, raisins or the like are taken and pounded, wine vinegar is added, and the mixture is seasoned with condiments in the same way that mortar is seasoned with straw." [http://bit.ly/charos9]

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietkiewicz

The bubbie of recipe sites is certainly the Jewish-food Passover Charoset Archives with 40 mouth-watering variations. [http://bit.ly/charos10] Kudos to Joan Michel for her research into even more exotic recipes from far-flung locales – Afghanistan, Babylon, Curaçao, etc. – and for the wonderful title of her Jewish Week article: The Mortar the Merrier. [http://bit.ly/charos11]

And let's not forget that a couple of years ago, The CJN profiled the oh so Canuck, Maple Charoset. [http://bit.ly/charos12]

If you can't afford to hire celebrity chef Wolfgang Puck to whip up a batch of charoset for you, at least you can check out his recipe, which is part of an entire Puck-based seder. [http://bit.ly/charos13]

Food writer Gil Marks says that traditionally charoset is made in a wooden bowl using a hackmesser or a mezzaluna for chopping. Despair not if you lack these utensils because Marks says that "the fruit and nuts can be chopped separately on a cutting board, then mixed together or they can be chopped in a food processor, but do not purée as it is meant to have texture." [http://bit.ly/charos14]

Rabbi Peter H. Schweitzer notes that "purists still insist on chopping everything by hand to maintain a coarse texture. This also lets these cooks experience the hard work of our ancestors when it came to making the mortar in the first place." [http://bit.ly/charos15] You can view some contemporary experts first-hand as they chop, mix and blend their variations of charoset in videos they have uploaded to YouTube. [http://bit.ly/charos16]

Nuts are at the heart of many charoset recipes and that can pose a problem for people with allergies – including chef Marcy Goldman's son. Her solution: New Age Charoset with cranberries, cherries, raisins and apples. "No one even bothers with the rest of the meal once they partake in this ambrosial mix." [http://bit.ly/charos17]

Meanwhile, Diabetes for Life recommends a Date and Apple Charoset with almonds (or walnuts), lemon rinds, cinnamon, ginger and wine. [http://bit.ly/charos18]

But before we conclude, a holiday health warning for you: did you know that a group of experts has published data that indicates seder participants should not partake of chopped liver and charoses simultaneously? This combination can lead to… charoses of the liver! [http://bit.ly/charos19]

Israel has 'real culture of innovation'

Riva Gold
Special to The CJN

Dr. Yaron Avitzur jokes that every Jewish mother in Israel now lets her kid choose his own career: they can become a doctor or a medical engineer.

Avitzur spoke about the core values behind Israeli innovation in the biotech industry in a recent lecture at Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue Darchei Noam.
